Radio forum airs candidates' views

By DEE ANNE HEADLEY
Collegian Reporter

In the first forum of its kind at K-State, student body presidential candidates had the opportunity to air their views last night on KSDB.

Lionel Grady, instructor in journalism and mass communications and KSDB advisor, was the forum moderator. Following candidates' opening statements, questions were directed by KSDB announcer Andy Sandler, sophomore; Leslie Phelps, senior and Collegian government affairs editor and Kerri Harter, junior and Collegian assistant government affairs editor. All are journalism and mass communications majors.

See related story, p. 2

Kenton Fisher, junior in accounting, used his opening statement to list the main points of his platform. He said one of his main concerns is faculty salaries. "We need quality teachers here for a good education," he said.

Rise in parking fees spurs debate: 'Cadillac' or necessary repairs?

BY CHARLENE FARRELL
Staff Writer

Controversy: Where to draw the line between necessary maintenance on parking lots and a Cadillac program of improvements.

This hotly-debated issue affects every faculty member, staff member and student who has purchased a permit granting them the privilege to park in one of the 7,134 campus parking lot stalls.

The parking fee adjustment necessary for the proposed changes has been in the making since early 1981 when Gene Cross, vice president for University Facilities, presented a proposal to the Traffic and Parking Council. The proposal included a 200 percent increase in parking fees for faculty, staff and students which would go to cover the expense of blacktopping all gravel lots, and overlaying, sealing or repaving existing blacktop. The plan also included landscaping, curbing and drainage improvements.

"We thought the figures by Dr. Cross were 'nice things'," said Lewis Hine, former member of the Traffic and Parking Council and physics storekeeper. "But it (the proposal) was too much at one time."

The council's consensus was in agreement with Hine's attitude about the proposal, resulting in their modification of the recommendation to a 10 percent increase for students and a 10, 15, or 70 percent increase for faculty and staff depending on income.

"It (the modified recommendation) would have had no impact at all," Cross said. "There would still be a financial shortfall in '83."

AN AD HOC COMMITTEE was established in the fall of 1981 and the same proposal was presented then. The ad hoc committee, comprised of faculty, staff, and one student representative, finalized a parking recommendation to present to President Duane Acker on Jan. 26. The recommendation included increasing parking fees 150 percent.

"The committee believes this proposal was the most conservative position they could propose and maintain the parking fee account in a financially sound condition for the next two or three years," Cross said.

By cutting the original proposal the ad hoc committee realized there would still be a capital deficit by fiscal year 1985, according to Michelle Hoferer, student representative of the ad hoc committee and senior in architectural engineering.

IN AN EFFORT to make up the resulting deficit, the ad hoc committee recommended the following:

— increasing parking fees for men's basketball games from $1 to $2.

— mandating state vehicles to pay a proportionate share for the use of parking spaces (they currently pay nothing).

— looking into alternative ways to fund the parking system.

"We've made an honest effort to come up with the dollars," said Cliff Meloan, professor of chemistry and member of the ad hoc committee.

However, the major argument lies not in how much the increase is, but if the increase is justified.

"I think there's no need to pave any of the (gravel) lots," Stuart Swartz, professor of civil engineering, said. "If we can use them now, we can use them 10 years from now.

"As a user, I'm perfectly happy to park in a dusty gravel lot for less money," he said.

THE QUALITY versus economic debate between gravel parking lots and asphalt parking lots sways from side to side.

Gravel provides better traction in the winter, helps alleviate the drainage problem, takes less maintenance and is less expensive.

However, asphalt creates no mud problems, no pitted cars from flying rocks and gives a better appearance.

According to Meloan, many people would be glad to pay a bit extra to avoid walking through mud and repairing dented cars.

"This is not a Cadillac-type of wish list," he said. "These are valuable improvements."

A "wish list" would include lighting and paving with cement, instead of asphalt, Meloan said.

"I believe it's an investment not to be put on hold," he said. "It will only cost more."

DURING THE summer of 1981, lot number 27 (north of Bushnell Hall) was sealed and revamped to include a triangle in the center, costing $9,994. The purpose of the triangle was a landscaping opportunity for the future, Cross explained.

The advantage of beautifying parking lots is evident, but many faculty think they should be the ones to decide how their money is used.

Reagan says 1983 budget not for rich

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Reagan formally sent Congress his 1983 spending plan Monday, challenging Democratic critics to substantiate charges that his is a budget for the rich. "It is not true," he insisted.

The $757.6 billion proposal signed by the president projects record deficits of $98.6 billion this year and $91.5 billion for the fiscal year that starts Oct. 1.

In New York, the stock market plunged Monday to its lowest point since last Oct. 29 in a sell-off that analysts attributed to gloom over the budget picture and rising interest rates.

Reagan said he hasn't given up his now-distant goal of bringing the budget into balance, but this plan, more than his last, encountered bitter rhetoric from Democrats and open acknowledgement by Republican leaders that it won't get through Congress unscathed.

House Speaker Thomas O'Neill, Reagan's chief Democratic antagonist, charged after a short courtesy briefing at the White House that the budget shows the president "has forgotten his roots (and) associated with that countryclub style of people."

"Well," Reagan countered during a signing ceremony in the Oval Office, "I've only played golf once since I've been president, and he's an inveterate golfer, and I'm sure he must have to go to a country club to play golf."

As he signed the first of two green-bound copies of the budget book with a ceremonial pen, Reagan quipped, "That will be weekend reading for Tip O'Neill."

"I'll send the pen with it," Reagan added, "because he may want to make some further cuts in it."

Senate Democratic leader Robert Byrd of West Virginia called the deficit projections "shocking" but said the true figures are much higher.

"This is really a campaign budget," Byrd charged, saying that last year the administration "fed phony numbers into the computer, and they're doing it again."

Candidates give opposing views on K-State's membership in ASK

By LISA KESSLER
Collegian Reporter

Six candidates for student body president gave their views on issues facing the University during a forum Monday in the Union courtyard.

Opposing the construction of a coliseum, William Craig, junior in computer science, said he would place his emphasis on faculty salary increases and changing student election campaign rules.

Also focusing on the loss of faculty to private industry, Kenton Fisher, junior in accounting, said because of this the quality of education is dropping. He called for ending K-State's involvement in the Associated Students of Kansas (ASK) and said students need to know where the money for the coliseum would go when collected.

STUDENT INVOLVEMENT and effective representation of the student voice was emphasized by Scott Long, junior in journalism and mass communications. Long said his two years experience as a student senator had prepared him for the job as student body president.

Jim Bob Morris, senior in management, said he thinks communication is the important issue. He would use communication and an open door policy as the "key link" to an effective administration.

"Student government kind of alienates themselves — not on purpose — they tend to close the door. Communication, I think, can solve a lot of the issues here," Morris said.

Another student senator, Kelly Presta, junior in political science, said that past accomplishments were irrelevant to the campaign and more important were future goals. He outlined a program that would realign student representation from colleges to living groups.

STRESSING THE need for strong academics and continued involvement in ASK, Bill Rogenmoser, junior in secondary science education, said although his involvement in student affairs was limited, his "people-oriented" outlook and confidence qualified him for the presidency.

A question-and-answer period followed the opening statements.

Doug Dodds, senior in political science and Student Senate chairman, accused Presta of having the worst attendance record of any student senator and said Presta failed to sponsor a single piece of legislation. How did he reconcile these facts with his new interest in student government? Dodds asked.

Presta said he missed one senate meeting and assumed it was excused because he left a note for Dodds and did not receive an answer from him. He added, "As far as legislation is concerned, you've (Dodds) been a difficult person to work with."

Kyle Exline, junior in geology, asked Morris if he would continue to play football this fall. Morris said he would be playing football and devoting 110 percent to athletics as well as to student government.

One spectator asked Fisher about his views on ASK. Fisher said he was against ASK and that he wanted to take the money allocated to ASK and "hire a part-time lobbyist just for K-State."

The candidates forum was prefaced by remarks from Angela Scanlan, student body president and senior in agriculture journalism, and Dodds.

Experience and the ability to handle problems on the local and state level should be the criteria by which the candidates are judged, Scanlan said.

Bills seeks ban of studded tires

TOPEKA — As a "simple way" to help save deteriorating Kansas roads, a Kansas House committee was urged Monday to ban the use of studded tires in the state.

"They do cause damage to the highways and that's a fact," Rep. J. Santford "Sandy" Duncan (R.-Wichita), said of the tires with metal and plastic studs. "This is one simple thing we can do to prevent some wear and tear on our highways."

Under a bill before the House Tansportation Committee, the use or sale of studded tires would be outlawed in Kansas after July 1, 1984, except for emergency vehicles such as ambulances, police and fire equipment.

Mob seeks postal job applications

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Nearly 9,000 people converged on Kansas City's main post office Monday to apply for 60 letter-sorting jobs with the U.S. Postal Service.

Monday was the first day interested persons could apply for the jobs, which pay $20,000 a year to start.

"It's terrible," said Glenn Proctor, director of employee and labor relations as he looked over the throng of applicants.

The rush left the Postal Service short of applications and an immediate request to reprint the yellow application cards was made.

The crowded lobby, however, was only the first step in a job-hunting process that will culminate in work for only 60 applicants.

The application cards, which will be available this week only, allow interested people to register. Jobseekers will be notified later of a date to appear for testing. The results of the tests will determine a ranking on a register for future hiring.

Ombudsman seeks inspection rights

TOPEKA — The Corrections Ombudsman Board wants the legal authority to inspect any premise of a state correctional institution at a reasonable time.

Ombudsman Preston Barton II told the House Federal and State Affairs Committee his board needed the legal authority because on occasion directors at correctional institutions had refused staff permission to enter the prison facilities and had on at least one occasion confiscated staff notes.

The ombudsman investigates complaints by prisoners and also staff.

Barton said the administrative problems occurred after the ombudsman had issued unfavorable reports.

The bill also wants to make any correspondence between an inmate and the independent ombudsman board confidential.

Big-time winners go back to work

SHEFFIELD, England — George and Elaine Dawes are buying a sporting goods store. They got bored at having nothing to do after winning a $1.8 million lottery jackpot.

"We don't want to be idle for the rest of our lives," Dawes told reporters Sunday.

After their big win last year for guessing the results of soccer matches, the couple stopped working. George, 39, gave up his job as a salesman and his wife, 37, closed down her neighborhood general store.

They bought a luxury house with a swimming pool and a Rolls-Royce and took holidays in the Caribbean, the Mediterrean and Europe.

"Now we are looking forward to getting up early in the morning once again," Elaine said.

Kansas' share in federal budget declines

TOPEKA — Individual Kansas taypayers will provide about $8.1 billion in revenue for President Reagan's proposed 1983 federal budget, according to figures released Monday by the Kansas Association of Commerce and Industry (KACI).

The KACI figures indicated that Kansas' share of the $756.6 billion 1983 federal budget declined almost $100 million from the previous year. In a prepared statement, KACI said Kansas taxpayers account for 1.07 percent of all federal taxes.

Kidnapped child returns home safely

LOS ANGELES — A 3-year-old hydrocephalic girl who authorities say was taken cross-country by her babysitter returned home Monday, suffering no apparent ill-effects from the 11-day odyssey.

Natalee Cochran and her mother, Cathy, were greeted by reporters at Los Angeles International Airport. At a brief news conference in which Natalee answered most questions with a nod or a shake of her head, Cochran said he child had not been mistreated and did not realize that anything had happened.

Natalee suffers from hydrocephaly, a buildup of fluid between the brain and skull. If the fluid is not drained periodically, dangerous pressure on the brain can result.

She was found Saturday at the Oh Shaw Motel in Gap, Pa., after the babysitter, Jody Finkle, 19, called the sheriff's department in Carson, Calif., the FBI said.

WHO CARES?

Chances are you didn't vote last year—in fact nearly 90 percent of the students who could have voted in the last election for Student Body President didn't.

WHY? Simply because most students have lost interest in Student Government—because they have heard the same old line about communication, year after year, and nothing really changes.

This year if you're ready for new ideas and new people, and some real changes, VOTE, even if you have never done so before.

This year vote for a Real Change.

Alcohol abuse targeted in bill

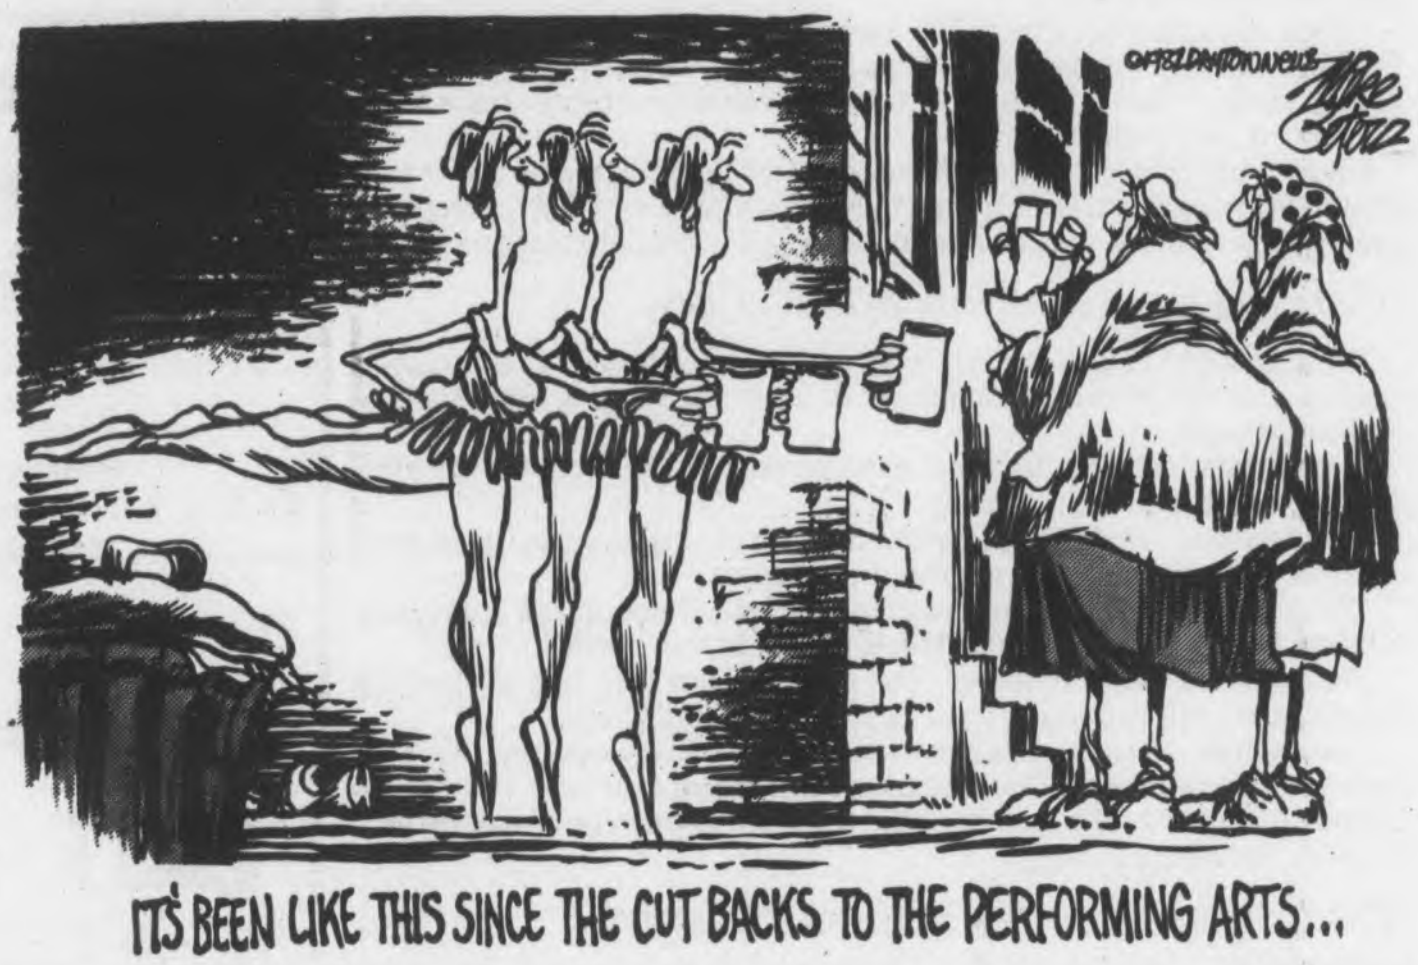
If the legislature passes a bill currently being considered, Kansas may soon join the growing number of states cracking down on the abuse of alcohol. The bill would require tougher punishment for those convicted of driving while intoxicated.

Drunk driving accounts for nearly half of the highway deaths each year, according to the National Highway Traffic Safety. Drunk driving is also the nation's single greatest killer of people between 16 and 24. Since 1972, some 250,000 Americans, more than four times the number of Americans killed in the Vietnam War, have died in accidents involving drunken driving.

Unfortunately, drunk driving is largely acceptable in our society. Thus, those convicted of driving while intoxicated (DWI) are given ridiculously light fines and a short, if any, jail sentence.

The Kansas bill would impose a mandatory two-day jail sentence and a fine ranging from $350 to $500, according to the Associated Press. In addition, the bill would revoke the driver's license of anyone convicted of driving while intoxicated for a period of 90 days to one year.

If a second conviction occurs the bill would require a 90-day jail sentence and a fine of $500 to $1,000. DWI convictions involving property damage, personal injury or death would receive even harsher treatment.



Col. David Harnbaker, superintendant of the Kansas Highway Patrol, testified to the House Transportation Committee that alcohol was involved in nearly 39 percent of all fatal traffic accidents in Kansas in 1980.

"The time has arrived to place the burden for those inconsiderate and extremely dangerous acts exactly where it belongs...on the shoulders of the drinking driver," Harnbaker told the committee, according to AP.

Other states are combating alcohol abuse by raising the minimum age to purchase alcoholic beverages. However, that policy doesn't take into account that many individuals, age 21 or over, are not able to handle alcohol either.

Giving suitably heavy fines and sentences to those who choose to drive drunk, endangering the lives of many innocent people, seems a more realistic and positive policy.

Coverage misleading

Editor,

Following my normal morning ritual Tuesday, I turned the television on to catch the news while I got ready for class. It seemed like an average morning until suddenly the regular news format was interrupted for a "Special News Report."

According to the report, something was amiss in Washington D.C. It seems some sort of "projectile" had struck the vice-president's limousine. The report went on to say something like "we can not be sure at this time, but it may have been a SNIPER ATTACK."

My concern is that the reporters jumped to this extreme conclusion. They could have just as easily reported that a rock may have struck the vice-president's car. I believe such spectacular reporting is uncalled for. It tends to overexcite the public to the point that they lose sight of the real facts.

I hear gossip from my peers daily, I don't need to hear it from the media. I expect a little more professionalism on the part of the reporters than that which was displayed in reporting this incident.

Ethical questions in Transylvania

Some people think journalists are vampires. That they live off the talented or knowledgeable members of society who provide the enterprising reporter with the life for an exploitive story.

Others of a similarly ungenerous vein liken journalists to vultures — skulking around the scene of a disaster, cold and bloodthirsty.

These two images aren't only in the minds of harried officials answering a reporter's questions, or someone with a secret. Journalists think of them too as they rush out the door to a homicide they've been assigned to cover. Or when a talented artist whose performance they've admired gives a condescending interview backstage.

This has been particularly difficult for me to accept. Covering events where my story is merely the reflection of someone's ability, I would continually question, "Am I a vampire, feeding off the talent of others"

THE QUESTION exists because no matter how good my story is, I'm not the source of it. Someone else gives it to me.

I guess attending the Winfield Bluegrass Festival finally enabled me to settle the question. Incredibly talented musicians were gathered in this small town. Their ability overwhelmed me and my purpose in being there seemed nonexistent.

Yet during the weekend as I talked to musician after musician, I came to realize that, in spite of the fact that my story would be a reflection of what they had created and I was dependent on them, I was fulfilling an independent function.

MY PURPOSE AS a journalist was to interpret my impressions of the festival and translate them into words. To put those impressions into terms to be universally understood. Or, like some kind of literary middleman, I was to bridge the gap between the actual event and the view to be seen by those who weren't there.

This aspect of journalism only comes into play with certain types of stories, obviously the impressions and subjective ideas of a reporter have no place in "hard news" stories where the reporter's views are irrelevant and he is a vehicle for finding and accurately stating facts.

The vulture circles overhead at this point.

It's very hard to balance the fact that one's livelihood depends on news happening with the fact that when news happens it's not always good. As an intern I rushed eagerly to cover a fire, excited about the big story, and discovered when I got there the house burning down belonged to someone with whom I worked. In my youthful naivete I can say for sure I was cured forever of being a vulture. I hope I'm right.

VULTURISM WAS mentioned when some of the staff of the Kansas City Star came to K-State to discuss the paper's coverage of the Hyatt Regency disaster. One of the reporters had gotten his first story by hiding behind a potted plant to record the rescue efforts and observe first hand what was going on.

He didn't help with the rescue. He made a conscious decision not to do so.

I don't know how I would have handled that. It's impossible to imagine being at the scene of such a tremendous disastor and standing behind a potted plant taking notes while screams ring and people are working desperately to save lives.

Yet the reporter's decision helped people to understand what had happened. It was brought into the living rooms of the city because he acted as he did. People were given the opportunity to be outraged because they knew.

ANOTHER REPORTER approached the situation differently. He carried water in and out of the hotel for the Red Cross. Each was there. Each got a story.

At a disaster it may be difficult for a reporter to stand and rationalize his necessity to society. But the notes he tries to take calmly and rationally may help people to understand and accept what happened. The reality of the horror should be brought out, not for sensational effect, but to explain the world in which we live. Journalists also function in this way to expose wrongs that harm society.

I read on the back of a Bob Dylan album something to the effect that good writing has degenerated into journalism. Maybe whoever wrote that thought we were all vultures and vampires. I don't think so.

Parking proposal: 'taxation without representation'

Editor,

I am opposed to the Parking Fee increase proposed by Vice-President Cross. Whether it is 200 percent, 150 percent or some other figure, the amount of this particular increase is not the central issue. The central issue is this: Should the students, faculty and staff of this University be forced to pay for whatever "improvements," landscaping, fountains, etc. that Mr. Cross desires without having any voice in how or why these things should be done?

Taxation without representation is an issue over which a war was once fought. If we are in favor of having these improvements perhaps we should help pay for them. But no one has asked us. We are simply told "Here is what we are going to do and you are going to pay for it." The Traffic and Parking Council, which constitutes our representation on such matters, refused to adopt Mr. Cross' "plan" whereupon he ignored its recommendation and set up an ad hoc committee to justify his proposals.

When new classroom buildings are built the faculty, staff and students are not forced to pay for them. The state pays for construction and future maintenance. Why is it different with parking facilities? Mr. Cross quotes a state law which, he says, requires that all parking facility costs be paid for by permit and misuse fees. But the law says no such thing. It only says these fees may be imposed and used for parking lot costs. "May" and "must" are quite different, but Mr. Cross apparently does not appreciate this. The fact that "things have always been done this way" is not a compelling reason to continue a bad system. If Mr. Cross' plans are adopted the present increase will be only the beginning with "the sky's the limit" for permit fees in the future.

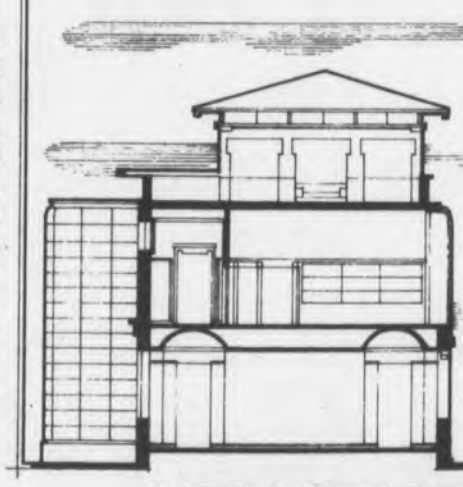
Dedication missing from elections



Editor,

Will it seems to be that time of the academic year when certain student candidates are compelled to desecrate the campus landscape with reams of Xeroxed promises. Such a contest! Logic has it: any student able to cover every tree trunk with a poster should win. For the independently wealthy, Collegian advertisements sporting the candidate's picture connect their looks with their name. All this is in spite of integrity, motivation and/or qualifications.

Perhaps this is a bit sarcastic. Yet, as an individual who is very involved with his college, I find these "elections" to be based more on fanfare rather than dedication to represent fellow students.

I am not trying to sell short the benefits of student government. I believe that it is time to step back and evaluate the effectiveness of this student election process. More action and representation out of the limelight may take some of the ego out of the commitment — but it would certainly be a show of heart.

Student Senate decision disputed

Editor,

Thursday I attended the student senate meeting, at which it was decided not to form a sports club allocating committee, and I must confess to feelings of disgust.

It is not from the fact that we, the soccer team, will not be receiving University funds, we can earn money. Rather it is a disgust born from years of hoping that someday the University would formally recognize that we represent it in a very real way.

Apparently, few students (and senators) know that their soccer team is the third best in Kansas and second in Big 8 league play. Further more, virtually every university team we play is funded by their schools. It is a source of astonishment for them, and embarrassment for us, when they discover that a team of our ability does not receive a penny from the University. However, not all is lost. With the support of our sponsor, University facility uses and senators like Paul Attwater, junior in economics and sponsor of the proposed bill, our team is alive and kicking.

Economics lack democratic ideals

Editor,

A recent poll shows that the majority of Americans believe that Reaganomics has hurt the poor but that they will eventually be helped as the country's economy is strengthened.

It is entirely possible that this is true. It should be pointed out, however, that a political system that ignores a segment of the population "for the good of the country" is, even if effective, certainly not democracy. Democracy is government "by (all) the people, for (all) the people."

Perhaps it is not surprising that the United States has a long history of supporting dictatorships in Korea, Vietnam, Iran and El Salvador, to name but a few. It is possible that we share more with them than a fear of communism.

Green 'n' white: Scouts create crowd at women's game; are thrilled by Willie's autograph

By PAM FITZSIMMONS
Collegian Reporter

Front row seats were impossible to find. Sometimes the band couldn't be heard over the cheers. Sales boomed at the refreshment stand.

Sound like your typical basketball game?

Typical it wasn't! Green and white, rather than purple and white, were the predominant colors when over 600 Girl Scouts watched the women's basketball team beat the Minnesota Golden Gophers 77-68 Saturday.

It was Kaw Valley Girl Scouts Visit K-State Day and the girls not only watched the basketball game, but also toured the campus and planetarium.

The idea to visit K-State originated last spring after Lynn Hickey, women's basketball coach, spoke at the annual Girl Scout Appreciation Dinner.

"After Lynn Hickey's talk on motivation, we decided it would be fun to visit K-State for a day and attend a women's basketball game," said Linda Tomery, troop services director at Marlatt Elementary School in Manhattan.

WHEN ASKED TO undertake the project, Tomery said she did not anticipate such a large response.

"The idea snowballed," Tomery said. "First it was just open to Manhattan troops, then other troops found out about the visit and they wanted to be included, too."

In fact, troops attending were from 13 northeastern counties in Kansas which comprise the Kaw Valley Girl Scout Council.

"I'm just glad I was sitting down when they told me about the tour. It was by far the largest group the tour program has hosted at one time," said Karen Barancik, senior in journalism and mass communications and campus tour coordinator.

Before the game, seven groups of between 40 to 50 people departed for the campus walking tour after a brief welcome from President Duane Acker. Another seven groups of Scouts attended a show at the planetarium which was arranged by Ted Stalec, assistant instructor of physics.

"The tour was really interesting. I had never seen such old buildings before," said Christina Cody, an eighth grade Cadette Girl Scout from Meridan.

When Tyrone Adams and Lafayette Watkins appeared at halftime to watch the rest of the women's game, a small cluster of Scouts turned into a horde around the two basketball players, as the girls clamored for autographs.

"I love every minute of this," Adams said as he signed dozens of programs.

Even the cheerleaders were asked to get in the act.

"It is shocking to be asked for my autograph. It's never happened before, but it's kind of fun," said Mary Chapman, freshman in general and a member of the Pridettes who cheer for the women's team.

As the game drew to a close and K-State was assured of a victory, the girls formed into groups again to take in the part of the program that they missed.

Tomery said several leaders told her how much their girls enjoyed visiting K-State. "We want to do this again — hopefully make it an annual event. I think some of the older girls have definitely decided to come to K-State when they are ready for college," Tomery said.

"I know I will come to K-State when I go to college. My sister goes to Baldwin, but I like K-State better," said Erin Heslop, a fifth grade Junior Girl Scout from Topeka.

Parking

"Why should we, as users, be made to pay for landscaping?" Heinz Bulmahn, associate professor of modern languages and president of Faculty Senate, said.

The University Facilities engineering staff evaluated the campus parking lots and made their recommendations for needed repairs. Spanning their proposed improvements over the next 10 years, repair costs would total over $5 million (see bar graph).

'We've made an honest effort to come up with the dollars.'

STUDENTS, FACULTY and staff have questions whether there is reason for all the repairs.

"They resurfaced Ford Hall's parking lot last summer and there wasn't anything wrong with it," Jayne Depew, senior in journalism and mass communications, said.

Such doubts point fingers at theplanners.

"The planning (for the proposal) was never calculated by a registered engineer," Swartz said.

'I'm perfectly happy to park in a gravel lot for less money.'

Bob Smith, professor of civil engineering, does not doubt the qualifications of the engineers in their own fields, but questions their authority in pavement design. The engineers received their education from K-State at a time when there were no pavement design courses offered, Smith said.

"Registration (for engineers) has nothing to do with it," said Jim Shepard, University Facilities architect and member of the ad hoc committee. "Experience is a much better education in cost-estimating than a formal education."

ANY IMPROVEMENTS made in the parking lot situation would have some benefits for those who hand over the extra cash. But then there are those who benefit and pay nothing.

A visitor is allowed to park free anywhere on campus as long as he has obtained a pass from the Information Booth.

The committee attributes the image of the University to this privilege, but there is also the question of who should pay for the image.

"If the visitors don't have to pay — fine. But why should the students, staff and faculty have to subsidize them?" Smith said.

Even if all the changes are justified, there is still another problem.

"It's just an inopportune time," Bulmahn said. "There's a decrease in income both for faculty, staff and students. I do realize they (the lots) have to be maintained, but the (cost) level demanded is too high."

Considering the current financial situation of the University, Smith said the University should be concerned with other things rather than trying to improve parking lots.

"There's not enough money to keep faculty or take care of operating expenses (labs, paper, etc.)," he said."It's beyond comprehension the top administration would even suggest it (such an increase)."

"Why should the faculty have to pay anyway?" Swartz said. "We don't have to pay for our offices."

EUGENE RUSSELL, professor of civil engineering, said he has been to universities where there were higher parking fees, therefore he does not think K-State's parking fees are overpriced.

However, he said he sees the need of the faculty receiving parking space as a fringe benefit.

'This is not a Cadillac-type of wish list.'

"Our (faculty) erosion in fringe benefits is worse than our erosion in salary," Russell said.

In an attempt to make the 150 percent increase less painful, the ad hoc committee suggests pursuing a payroll deduction for faculty and staff. However, their suggestion seems to be providing little comfort.

"It's an insult to the faculty and staff to even talk about it (a payroll deduction)," Smith said.

Russell said he believes the payroll deduction would help lessen the shock of the immediate cost, "but it seems like a way to increase (fees) with fewer complaints."

FINDING ALTERNATIVE means for funding parking lot improvements may be a difficult task.

A Kansas statute states: "The Board (of Regents) may provide for the charging and collection of fees for the use of parking facilities at an institution and these...shall be placed in a separate account and may be used by the institution where collected for the purpose of maintenance and repair of parking facilities at such institution."

'Why should we, as users, be made to pay for landscaping.'

Bill Coffman, attorney for the Board of Regents, said he has no knowledge of a written law that mandates parking maintenance as being self-supporting.

According to Coffman, it's a sort of "unwritten policy" for universities to generate their own lot funds.

If the institution has trouble generating parking lot money, logic would direct it to the state to ask for the needed funds.

Logic would also make the institutions realize that if the state will not allot money for highway maintenance, they will not hand out money to fix parking lots, Meloan said.

Two resolutions will be presented at the Faculty Senate meeting today. One resolution suggests parking should be a fringe benefit. The other suggests users not pay for capital improvements, and visitors' cars and state cars pay for stall space.

After voting, the senate will send its recommendation to Acker for review.

Acker has received the recommendation from the ad hoc committee, but according to Janet Woodward, assistant to the president, he will take no quick action on it before first reviewing it with the faculty and staff.

Fans conserve energy, create nostalgic appeal

By DARCY LINDSTROM
Collegian Reporter

Casablanca, Bogart, hot summer days and smoked-filled rooms seem to have created the nostalgic appeal of paddle-type ceiling fans.

Now, through the research being conducted at the K-State Institute for Environmental Research, people are discovering that these fans will also save energy, according to Fred Rohles, director of the institute.

The research will look at how effective ceiling fans are in reducing the need for air conditioning while maintaining human comfort, Rohles said.

The prime contractor of the research is Battelle of Richmond, Wash., and the U.S. Department of Energy is sub-contracting the project, according to Rohles.

ROHLES EXPLAINED that ceiling fans do not actually lower the temperature of a room, but circulate the air already in the room, which air conditions the body.

The experiments are conducted by exposing test subjects, who are usually students, to ceiling fans operating at various speeds under different room temperatures, he said.

Eight subjects, four men and four women, are tested as a group. Before the experiment begins, the subjects' temperatures are taken and they are asked to change into short-sleeved shirts and light slacks. This rules out temperature variation and clothing as variables in the experiment, Rohles said. The subjects are then taken to an environmental chamber where all conditions relating to human comfort can be controlled.

The chamber, one of only three in the world, controls air temperature, relative humidity, mean-radiants (windows), air velocity, clothing, activity and time of exposure, he explained.

THE SUBJECTS are seated at eight different stations during the three-hour experiment, and each person moves to a new station every half hour. During the first hour, no ceiling fans are used. The fans are then turned on at four different velocities during the final two hours of the experiment. The subjects are not allowed to move in any way, except during the period they move to different stations.

After each half hour, the subjects are asked to complete four different ballots, including a category rating scale which rates the temperature from very hot to very cold; a thermal comfort ballot which uses adjective pairs to compile a composite score; a temperature preference ballot which asks the subject if the room should be warmer, cooler or remain the same; and an air plume quality ballot which measures the air blown directly on the subject.

The testing will continue through June when the data that has been compiled will be published in a report, according to Rohles.

Rohles said he expects the study will show that at least 50 percent of the people tested will conclude that a room which is comfortable at 77 degrees Farenheit without the use of a fan will be equally as comfortable as a room that is 84 degrees Farenheit when a fan is being used.

THE SEVEN-DEGREE variation in temperature could save the consumer 21 percent in energy consumption, according to an estimate from the National Bureau of Standards.

Figures taken from the Jan. 7 issue of The Wall Street Journal state that 4 to 5 million ceiling fans were produced last year, and total sales were more than $700 million. The estimate for 1984 ceiling fan sales is $1 billion.

Robinson estimated his sales of ceiling fans as increasing more than 25 percent from the previous year's sales, and said that he expects another increase this season.

Although Robinson notes that some interest in the fans is nostalgic, he said he sees that the primary reason for the increase in sales is based on the energy-saving aspect of the fans. Robinson pointed out that the fans can be used to increase the comfort range in both heating and cooling.

Gary Fiffe, owner of the National Fan Warehouse in Junction City, said he has been in business for two months. He started his business because he said he believed, after doing extensive surveys, that the demand for ceiling fans would be increasing in this area.

FIFFE SAID HE attributes the majority of the increase in ceiling fan sales to their energy-saving qualities along with their nostalgic appeal.

Art and Marie Lewis, Manhattan residents, have had their fan only a week, but say they can already tell a difference in heating comfort, besides a reduction of smoke in the room.

Harvey and Jean Ilg, Manhattan residents, installed a ceiling fan while redecorating their home. According to Jean, she decided to install the fan for both decorative and circulation reasons.

"We added a sun room to the front of our home and made the garage into a dining room. We wanted something to circulate the air from the sun room into the dining room, so we installed the fan," Jean explained.

The experiment with ceiling fans is not the first, nor the last the institute will be conducting concerning with thermal comfort, according to Rohles.

"We have been in the thermal comfort business for 18 years," he said. "Nobody knows more about thermal energy than we do."

Rohles said he expects that one of his next projects will be looking at how effective fans are in reducing the need for heating while maintaining human comfort.

Williams' parents violate gag order

ATLANTA (AP) — Wayne B. Williams' parents and an expert defense witness were cited for contempt of court Monday by the trial judge, who said they had violated his gag order by discussing the murder case with the news media.

Judge Clarence Cooper said Homer and Faye Williams had discussed the case on a radio talk show, thus violating his order barring potential witnesses from talking with the media about the trial.

Cooper also cited New York pathologist Dr. Daniel Stowens for contempt after Stowens admitted granting two newspaper interviews about the case in December. The judge issued the citations from his office, and the jury was not made aware of them.

The judge ordered all three to appear at a hearing following the trial to answer the contempt charges. Under Georgia law, they could be fined $200 and sentenced to 20 days in jail.

STOWENS HAD OPENED the seventh week of the trial Monday by telling the jury that the charges against Williams "just don't make any sense."

Williams, a 23-year-old black free-lance photographer and self-styled talent promoter, is charged with murdering Nathaniel Cater, 27, and Jimmy Ray Payne, 21, two of 28 young blacks slain here in a 22-month string of deaths. There have been no arrests in the 26 other cases.

Stowens, a Utica, N.Y., pathologist, said he was "shocked" and "incensed" that Williams had been charged with murder in the Payne and Cater cases. He had testified Friday that he could find no evidence of foul play.

Stowens said he had studied the autopsy report on Payne and was shocked to learn that medical examiners didn't "know the cause of death, yet it was used as evidence in a murder charge."

He said he concluded from his study of the Cater autopsy that "there was less to work with than with Payne. I was incensed this went on to a murder indictment."

DURING CROSS-EXAMINATION of Stowens, prosecutors attempted to discredit his testimony by portraying him as a publicity seeker who had little experience in criminal cases.

Stowens conceded he had performed only one criminal autopsy since 1968. But, he said: "It's not how many I've done. There is a standard body of work available in medical literature, and I read it and I stay with it."

The defense witness also admitted granting interviews that were published in The Atlanta Journal and The Atlanta Constitution on Dec. 4, but he said the publicity was not important to him.

Cooper issued the contempt citation against Stowens after reviewing a transcript of that testimony later Monday.

The Williamses were not in court Monday and could not immediately be reached for comment.

Arcade owners fret over losses

Video game buffs master patterns

NEW YORK (AP) — There's trouble in Video Game City — code books. Memorize the manual and you'll get hours of playing time for just one quarter.

More and more video buffs have been exchanging techniques for pattern playing, sending arcade owners, who grossed an estimated $5 billion last year, to the edge of financial hyperspace.

Now the owners face a new problem — a growing number of best-selling paperbacks by video game wizards that serve as how-to manuals.

"Of course it's going to hurt business," said Irving Tauve, co-owner of Manchester Music, a New Hampshire company that owns about 700 video games. "The longer a person plays on a quarter the less quarters I get."

There are at least five paperbacks on the market: Signet's "Mastering Pac-Man" by blackjack expert Ken Uston; Bantam's "How To Master the Video Games;" Pocket Books's "How To Win At Pac-Man;" Simon @ Schuster's "How To Beat the Video Games;" and Warner Books' "Scoring Big at Pac-Man."

The books range in price from $1.95 to $3.95.

"Theoretically, you could have a user's manual for each of these games," Uston said.

THE ORIGINAL PRESS RUN on Uston's book was 500,000, and according to Signet spokeswoman Fern Leiber Edison, store orders before the book was released required printing of another 250,000 copies. After two weeks in bookstores, Uston's book has climbed to No. 5 on B. Dalton's mass market best-seller list.

Bantam's entry, written by 19-year-old New Yorker Tom Hirschfeld, has sold about 650,000 copies and recently appeared on The New York Times mass market paperback list.

Pac-Man has received so much literary attention because it lends itself to more thorough analysis than attack and reflex games. Uston said maze games like Pac-Man require "the most skill, about 90 percent, and only 10 percent hand-and-eye coordination." Attack games range from 90 percent hand-and-eye coordination to 50-50, he added.

USTON TURNED HIS attention to Pac-Man while awaiting the outcome of court appeals on his banishment from casinos in Atlantic City. He is an expert blackjack "counter" who can calculate the chances of a high or low card turning up after several decks of cards have been played.

Uston's book is the most elaborate on Pac-Man, still one of the most popular of all arcade games. He provides diagrams of patterns for the original arcade games, gives advice on how to handle new programs and tips on how to play the various table models, some of which look, sound and play like the larger arcade versions.

"The manufacturers are so worried that everyone's going to master these games," said Uston, during an interview conducted recently over a Pac-Man board at a Broadway arcade.

"But look, I just messed up," he said as his Pac-Man was caught by a pursuing monster. Until he was distracted by a crowd which had gathered around his board, he had effortlessly reached a score in excess of 50,000. Novices have to scramble to get 15,000.

USTON, WHO IS writing a second book on arcade games, doesn't consider himself an expert at playing, just at analyzing. At a recent arcade party held to promote Coleco's new line of portable, self-contained games, including Pac-Man, Uston brought along Raymond Chan, a 20-year-old college student from San Francisco.

Uston asked Chan to help him with his book research after he saw Chan walk away bored from a Pac-Man after racking up 1.4 million points without a single mishap.

Chan thinks the pattern books make arcade playing more fun and interesting. "They show how the games work and give more of the fine details," he said. "The more patterns you got, the more interesting it is. Once you get the hang of it, it's more fun."

"It might take the self-experimentation out of it, and maybe that's bad, but look at all the quarters (the experimentation) would gobble up," Uston said.

THE ARCADE OWNERS, concerned in the end with the balance sheet, don't see it that way. The longer each game lasts the longer it is before the next quarter drops into the machine.

To combat pattern playing, new computer programs have been devised.

"Most of our games are speeded up," said Ellsworth Brown, manager of Leisureland at the Morris County Mall in New Jersey. "After all, that's what we're in the business for, to make money, right?"

Brown said most of his customers feel that how-to books "spoil the game, but then there's the professionals, who want to get everything they can for their quarter."

New computer chips to change programs and accelerated games usually put would-be pros in their place, said Brown. "We had a guy who got 600,000 on Pac-Man. Now, with the game in the 'advanced stage,' he's lucky if he gets 50,000."

Ten vie for positions on off-campus council

By BETH TURNER
Collegian Reporter

A seven-member council representing off-campus students, will be elected Wednesday. Polls will be open from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the Union.

These elected council members will be responsible for representing approximately 10,000 off-campus students to student government leaders.

"The off-campus council is the link between off-campus students and Student Senate," said Gene Russell, junior in industrial engineering and Off-Campus Student Association (OCSA) president. "They (council members) are expected to help student involvement by bringing up current issues and ideas at meetings."

OCSA council provides a voice for student government leaders to hear, Ray Lundin, senior in history and OSCA vice president, said. "They're supposed to create involvement within the student organization, the University and also (maintain) a voice between the students and the community."

Council members will elect a president, vice president, secretary and treasurer, Lundin said. The remaining three officers will be council members to vote on decisions and reflect a majority decision of the council.

THE ELECTED COUNCIL will be responsible for preparing the annual budget and presenting it to the Student Senate Finance Committee, Russell said. The budget is used for ads and communication needed by the organization. This year the organization was allotted four cents per off-campus student.

"Communication has and always will be a problem for our organization. We can't call up 10,000 people and announce there is a meeting. People misunderstand that we're an organization, not a club with dues. Everyone is welcome," Russell said. "Anyone living off campus is a member of the organization."

Involvement with the organization has increased over the four years of its existence, Russell said. The first year about 20 people attended the meetings. Now attendance averages 70 or better, he said.

Wildcats qualify for NCAA at weekend meet

By TRACY ALLEN
Collegian Reporter

For Wildcat pole vaulter Doug Lytle, breaking school records is becoming a common occurence this season.

In the Oklahoma City Indoor Track Invitational last Saturday, Lytle broke his own record in the pole vault with a jump of 17-feet-8. His previous record was 17-feet-4.

According to the 6-foot-1 All-American, the meet was not what he expected. "I was not pleased with my jump," Lytle said. "I haven't been up to par like I usually am. Part of that though, is due to a heel injury which I suffered a couple of weeks ago. Therefore, things are going somewhat slow for me right now," he said.

"However," said Lytle, "I do feel like I'm starting to do some things right. It seems like everytime I jump, I can see myself improving."

Lytle participated in the Dallas Herald Invitational two weeks ago, finishing in fourth place with a vault of 17-feet-5, three inches above his previous mark.

Head Coach Steve Miller believes that Lytle is one of the best vaulters in the country. "Not only do I think he is on the brink of being one of the best vaulters in the country but he is also on the brink of being one of the best vaulters in the world," he said. "I believe that in the next few weeks, he should easily clear 18 feet."

In the meet, which was held at the Myriad Convention Center, Oklahoma City, six other Wildcats also participated. Over 20 schools competed, including such powerhouses as Houston, Texas, Arkansas and Oklahoma State Universities.

For the Wildcats, two school records were broken. Not only did Lytle break his record in the pole vault, but Kelly Wenlock broke her record in the long jump. Wenlock, whose previous record was 19-feet-6, cleared a jump of 19-feet-7.

As for Wenlock, the 5-foot-6 freshman from Sunbury, England, "I didn't think I did as well as I would have liked to. I felt quite good going into the meet," she said. "However, I didn't expect to get four scratches."

Other finishers for K-State included Greg Bartlett in the shot put. Bartlett set a personal best with a distance of 56-feet-10. In the women's shot put, Janice Stuckey finished in second place with a throw of 46-feet-2, her third best throw of her career. Stuckey, who had thrown a school record of 47-feet-2, previously won the shot in the Kansas City/TFA Classic two weeks ago. In that meet, she threw 46 feet 4.

The remaining competitors for the 'Cats were Beets Kolarik in the high jump and second place finisher Veryl Switzer in the long jump (24-feet-11). Kolarik, who jumped 5 feet 10 in the high jump tied her own record which she set in a meet against Nebraska earlier this season.

According to Assistant Coach Barry Anderson, the meet was a good experience for the 'Cats.

"It gave us the chance to see some teams from other parts of the country who we usually don't get the chance to run against indoors," he said. "Not only that, but it also gave us the chance to look at some of our field event people. Since most of them are close to qualifying for the NCAA meet, we decided to give them another shot at trying to qualify for it by letting them participate in the meet."

Representing the 'Cats at the NCAA indoor meet March 12-13 in Pontiac, Mich. will be Doug Lytle in the pole vault, Veryl Switzer in the long jump, Deb Pihl in the mile run, Kelly Wenlock in the long jump and Beets Kolarik in the high jump.

Virginia replaces Missouri at top position

By The Associated Press

Virginia, paced by super center Ralph Sampson, took over the top spot in The Associated Press college basketball Monday as Missouri, which had been there for two weeks, fell to No. 4 after being knocked from the unbeaten ranks by Nebraska.

Virginia, which blasted pre-season favorite and No. 2 ranked North Carolina 74-58 last Wednesday, was a near-unanimous choice for the top spot. The Cavaliers, 22-1 behind Sampson — college basketball's player of the year last season — collected 57 of 60 first-place votes and 1,197 of a possible 1,200 points from a nationwide panel of sports writers and broadcasters.

Coach Terry Holland's Virginia team, ranked third a week ago, is only the third school to occupy the No. 1 position this season. North Carolina, which edged DePaul, 20-1, in the balloting to retain the No.2 slot this week, had ruled from the preseason poll until being upset by Wake Forest in mid-January. It was replaced at the time by Missouri.

North Carolina, 18-2 after rebounding from the Virginia loss to beat both Furman and The Citadel, received 1,090 points — just eight more than the DePaul Blue Demons, who were tabbed No. 1 on two ballots.

Missouri, which until last Saturday's 67-51 loss to the Cornhuskers was the nation's only remaining major unbeaten team, managed one first-place vote and 1,004. That was just enough to keep the Tigers, 19-1, ahead of Iowa, 17-2, which retained the No. 5 position with 990 points.

Oregon State and Tulsa both jumped four slots in this week's poll and took over the Nos. 6 and 7 positions, Tulsa following an 80-75 win over highly regarded Wichita State.

Cousins vie for top spot

By BILL MOROSCO
Collegian Reporter

For the past year and a half, two long jumpers for the men's track team have truly been 'all in the family.' Rodney Brogden and fourth cousin Veryl Switzer have been scoring points for the Wildcat track team, but at the same time, a friendly rivalry prevails between the two. They run together, jump together, and most of all, win together.

During the 1980-81 track season, Brogden and Switzer were ranked third and fourth in the Big Eight Conference, respectively. This season, Brogden has dropped to fifth, but Switzer upped his ranking to third.

Despited a strong sense of competition between the cousins, both Brogden and Switzer still claim to be the best of friends.

But even as friends, the two have engaged in a rivalry that dates back to their early days in high school, according to Switzer.

"We only actually competed against each other once in high school — during Rodney's senior year and my junior year at the KU Relays," Switzer said. "The rest of the time we just called each other on the phone to see how the other had done."

THE TELEPHONE RIVALRY that took place in high school has now turned into a one-on-one competitive confrontation.

"I really want Veryl to do well, but my pride and my ego really want to beat him," Brogden said.

Although the competitive level between Brogden and Switzer is high, they both respect the others potential and performances.

"If Veryl happens to pop off a really good jump and I also hit one but his is longer, then I respect his performance," Brogden said.

This relationship between Brogden and Switzer is evident to those who are in contact with them.

"Their relationship is super, both on the track and off. They are tremendously competitive with each other but still maintain a friendly rivalry," said Greg Kraft, assistant track coach.

DURING ACTUAL COMPETITION, Brogden and Switzer "exchange every day small talk and just act natural with one another," Brogden said. "When it comes down to the final and deciding jumps, we both tend to get very quiet. But we still lend emotional support to the other — at least until the other pops one. Then it is up to the other to bear down and try to pop one back."

"We tend to be much more comfortable around each other as opposed to being around other team's opponents," Switzer said. "There is a definite feeling of support between us."

"It helps having my cousin on the same team with me because we really try to get each other fired up," Switzer said. "When we are fired up, that's when we tend to jump our best."

"Since we are close, we try to help and coach each other — not just by firing each other up but by watching for the other's position on the board, helping out with measuring steps and even offering some suggestions about jumping techniques," Brogden said.

"I really like competing against Veryl. It's always exciting and never gets old. Most meets would be boring if Veryl were not around," Brogden said. "Sometimes I wonder if I could jump as well if Veryl were not around to compete with."

"Competing against Rodney helps me compete against other good long jumpers. It gives me confidence and, at the same time, the needed experience," Switzer said.

THE DIFFICULTIES that occasionally face Brogden and Switzer are boredom and edginess, Switzer said.

"Seeing each other every day under practice conditions tends to get a little boring, and sometimes we get a little edgy towards one another," he said. "But this edginess never lasts long, then we're back helping each other out."

The major difference between the two long jumpers is their styles. Brogden uses the hang technique of former track star Bob Beamon, the current world outdoor record holder. In contrast, Switzer uses the hitch kick technique of Carl Lewis, a world indoor record holder.

According to Kraft, neither style is better. The jumper has to decide which suits him best.

"Both styles are good," he said. "With Rodney's pop off the board, the hang technique works very well for him. With Veryl's speed, the hitch kick works equally well for him."

KRAFT SAID he is confident both Brogden and Switzer have realistic chances to qualify for the national meet. Jumps of 25 feet indoors or 25-feet-6 outdoors automatically qualify athletes for nationals. Switzer has already qualified with a leap of 25-2 at an indoor meet in Kansas City.

But shooting for a national berth is only part of the goals that Brogden and Switzer have in mind for themselves. Both athletes believe that setting goals helps their performance.

"I want to be the first 26-foot long jumper in K-State's history, mainly to prove to the author of the article that appeared in the spring sports catalog that his prediction was wrong," Brogden said. "I would also like to leave K-State with a record indoor or outdoor which would be out of Veryl's reach. My ultimate goal would be to make the U.S. Olympic team, even as an alternate."

SWITZER'S GOALS are similar to those of Brogden.

"I want to jump 27-5 outdoors within two years," Switzer said. "I feel that with the coaching staff here at K-State, it can be realistically achieved. I would also like to run the hundred meters in 10.21 seconds. Finally, I would also like to be a member of the U.S. Olympic team."

As friends, each wants the other to do well and, as a result, they are not afraid to critique each other.

"I think Veryl has great speed. He is a great competitor, and he possesses a very good jumping technique," Brogden said.

"I feel that Rodney has great initial pop off the board, has good instincts, and he is also very competitive," Switzer said.

The statistical accomplishments of the "cousin connection," as referred to by one another, are impressive. During his sophomore year, Brogden placed third in the Big Eight meet with a jump of 24-11. Brogden was also KU Relays champion in 1979 and two-time state high school long jump champion.

Switzer's accomplishments are equally impressive. As a high school senior, he won three gold medals at the 1980 KU Relays.

As a college freshman, Switzer placed second and third in the long jump at the KU and Texas relays. Switzer's best jump has been 25-4 at the K-State triangular last season. That mark is the fourth best jump in K-State history.

Home-brew cuts costs, has 'body'

By DEE ANNE HEADLEY
Collegian Reporter

Prohibition may be over, but the old methods and recipes for making beer are still practiced by some.

Mike Nutterfield, sophomore in general, makes beer in his room at his fraternity house.

Both became interested in making beer because of costs.

"We (Nutterfield and Tom Buckley, a December graduate) started making the beer so that we could cut down on the money we paid for beer," Nutterfield said.

"I started making beer when I was in graduate school," Peck said. "We didn't have much entertainment money, so I got the recipe from some other graduate students who were making beer at the time. We continue to make beer because my wife is allergic to commercial beer."

"He was always talking about his home-brew, how cheap it was and how good it was, so we wanted the same thing for us," Nutterfield said.

Some home brewers use packaged beer-making kits. Others, like Nutterfield and Peck, collect their brewing paraphernalia themselves,

The required equipment for making beer consists of a 10-gallon porcelain crock for holding the beer during fermentation, a hydrometer, a bottle capper and caps, two plastic containers, one for water and one for mixing ingredients, and a 5-foot plastic hose for siphoning beer.

A hydrometer is a glass tube with a weighted, bulbous end with a scale printed along one side. It floats on top of the liquid and indicates when fermentation is complete.

For bottles, Nutterfield said he prefers long-necked beer bottles, which use caps instead of screw-on tops.

INSTEAD OF A crock, Peck uses a 10-gallon plastic trash barrel.

"Crocks are heavy and they're hard to manipulate when you clean them," Peck said. Another problem with using a crock is that the porcelain can get imperfections in it which allows yeasts from the air to lodge in them, causing an "off flavor" in the beer, he added.

Once yeast from the air has lodged in the crock it no longer can be used, Peck said.

Instead of using a plastic hose to drain beer out of the barrel, Peck has developed another method.

"I took the spigot off a sun tea jar and put it on the outside towards the bottom of the barrel," Peck said. "It's easier than siphoning."

PECK HAS COLLECTED different-shaped quart bottles to store his beer.

"One problem you run into is finding cappable bottles," Peck said. "The screw-on top bottles do not form reliable seals with the caps available for home capping."

To begin the beer-making process, the two men heat one can of malt extract so it will pour. Nutterfield then mixes it with five gallons of warm water and 10 pounds of table sugar in the crock.

Nutterfield then adds four more gallons of warm water, a tablespoon of salt and a "pinch" of baking yeast and mixes until everything is dissolved. After everything is mixed, Nutterfield lets the mixture ferment for about five days.

At this stage the mixture is dark brown with white bubbles floating on top. The mixture becomes lighter as it ferments.

To aid in fermentation, Nutterfield suspends a bare 50-watt bulb directly over the liquid to maintain the beer at a constant temperature. He also covers the crock with a cloth to keep fruit flies out of the beer.

ACCORDING TO Zanelli's "Beer and Wine Making Illustrated Dictionary," fermentation is the process by which sugar is converted by yeast into alcohol and carbon dioxide. Fermentation is affected by temperature. The ideal temperature for starting and maintaining fermentation is about 78 degrees Fahrenheit.

"When the hydrometer says that it (the beer) is ready, I add about one gallon of cool water to slow down the fermentation," Nutterfield said.

Nutterfield and his roommates siphon the beer out of the crock with the plastic hose. In order to prevent yeast sediment from being drawn into the bottles, they tape a wooden peg to the side of the hose so that it extends about an inch past the end of the hose. The peg stands on the bottom of the crock, so the hose is above the sediment.

The beer is siphoned into plastic pitchers before being poured into sterilized bottles. The bottles are put into cases and stored in a cool room for about a week.

"After it (the beer) sits out for a week, we refrigerate it for another week or two before drinking," Nutterfield said.

ACCORDING TO Nutterfield, when the beer is first bottled it still has yeast in it and is cloudy. As the beer sits out, the yeast settles and forms a layer about one-eighth of an inch thick on the bottom of the bottles, he added.

The beer continues to ferment in the bottles, producing alcohol and carbon dioxide. The carbon dioxide builds up pressure in the capped bottles, which is why space is left at the top. The gas goes into the space and does not shatter the bottles.

Nutterfield calls his beer Buckfield Beer, which originated from the two names of Nutterfield and Buckley.

One batch, according to Nutterfield, makes about 96 12-ounce bottles of beer.

The total cost of the ingredients and caps for each batch is about $8, Nutterfield said.

INSTEAD OF ADDING water at different intervals, Peck mixes 10 gallons of water and 8⅓ pounds of table sugar together while the malt is softening. He then adds the malt, a "pinch" of yeast and a teaspoon of salt.

Like Nutterfield, Peck uses a heat source to maintain the beer at a constant temperature during fermentation.

"We set the barrel on a stool near one of the heat registers in our kitchen," Peck said.

Instead of five days, Peck said his beer takes about three days to ferment to the correct level.

When fermentation is complete, Peck drains the beer into sterilized bottles through the spigot.

"The tap is not at the bottom, so the sediment settles below the tap," Peck said. "We drain it slowly. I've got a plastic pipe fitting that sticks up from the spigot and prevents a current from drawing sediment into the beer."

Peck uses wooden boxes with partitions to store the bottles.

"The partitions reduce the incidence of breakage," Peck said. If a bottle breaks because of too much pressure build-up, the partitions prevent the force from breaking other bottles, he added.

"After we've made a batch, we let it sit in the basement for at least three weeks," Peck said. "If you put it in the refrigerator right after it's bottled, the yeast action slows way down or quits.

"Our beer is darker than other beer," he said. "It has a lot more body than many of the popular beers sold today. It's more carbonated and has a wine taste."

"We usually have two batches going at the same time, one batch in the refrigerator and one batch aging," Peck said. "We make it about once a month."

There are about 40 quart bottles in each batch, he said.

Many home brewers may not be aware of a federal law governing the amount of beer that can be made in one year.

According to the law, each adult 18 years old and over is allowed to make 100 gallons of beer per adult per household per year. It also states that the beer can only be consumed on the premises where it is made.

According to Gary Roberts, who owns a beer and wine-making supply store in Mission and teaches home brewing classes, some beer-making recipes do not produce good quality beer.

"The worst problems I find are the old recipes dating from Prohibition which call for baker's yeast and granulated sugar," he said. "They give the beer a yeast flavor, make it cloudy and cause an inconsistent alcohol content (for each batch). They also give the beer a cidery, wine taste. It doesn't resemble beer in any way, shape or form."

Class sees rare bald eagle

By KAY HUNTER
Collegian Reporter

High in a tree beside the Blue River perched a mature bald eagle surveying his kingdom with a fierce, noble air.

Quickly he turned his head from side to side, the white feathers shining like a crown in the wintry sun.

To the 10 members of the University for Man (UFM) Meet a Bald Eagle class, the best was saved for last. On Saturday morning they drove from Eagle Island on the Kansas River to various places along Tuttle Creek without seeing a close-up of an eagle. Their last hope was the Blue River where this fellow sat calmly but alertly.

He was about a half- to three quarters of a mile away from the group, obviously wary but enjoying being the center of attention.

Something on the river caught his eye and down he swooped with graceful, effortless power. Then he glided up, finding a new tree for his temporary throne.

IT WAS NOT until this bald eagle was in flight that one actually realized how large he was.

"He's got about a 7-foot wingspan," said Monty Hinten, freshman in fisheries and wildlife biology and instructor for the class.

'I think that if you could throw a Big Mac out in the river, an eagle would eat it.'

"I'm 6 feet tall, so that would be like lying me lengthwise and tacking on about a foot," he added.

Adult bald eagles are from 30- to 31 inches tall and will have a wingspan of 7- to 7½ feet, according to Hinten. They are the second largest raptor in North America next to the California Condor, he said.

Bald eagles will migrate south to the Midwestern and Southern states. This includes Texas, Kansas, Illinois, Colorado, Missouri, Nebraska, California, Maryland and any other state along the big riverways. They arrive at their destinations in late November or early December, according to Hinten.

"The first one I saw this year was Oct. 22, a big juvenile out there flying around Stockdale Cove or the Stockdale area," Hinten said. That is the earliest recorded siting for this area, he added.

Hinten said bald eagles will follow ducks and geese during their migration because they have learned some are wounded during the hunting season and this means an easy meal.

HE SHOWED the class a picture in Audubon Magazine of a bald eagle sitting on top of a garbage heap.

"Eagles are lazy birds. They'll eat just about anything they can hold," Hinten said. "I think that if you could throw a Big Mac out in the river, an eagle would eat it. Those guys, they're not proud at all."

Steve Fretwell, who until recently was a biology instructor, had an interesting analogy about the bald eagle as a symbol of the United States.

"The bald eagle eats carrion, you know, eats the food that is the dredge of nature and sort of molds that, if you will, into a picture of elegance and nobility and honor, which is what you associate with an eagle," Hinten said.

"You take the United States," he said, "we started out as a country of vagabonds and criminals and all this kind of stuff and built up into one of the most powerful nations and most respected nations in the world, so it's really a unique analogy he came up with," Hinten said.

EAGLE ISLAND is the largest roosting site for northeast Kansas. The island harbors one-fifth of the total population of Kansas bald eagles. This is anywhere from 40 to 60 birds, Hinten said.

Hinten told the class that juvenile bald eagles are often confused with mature golden eagles.

"I've made that mistakes several times myself," he admitted.

'Last year there were 9,500 bald eagles in the lower 48 states. So the population is increasing.'

It is not until a bald eagle's fourth season that his head starts to turn a little white. Until then a young bald eagle is brown-headed and looks similar to a golden eagle. The only difference is a golden eagle will have a feathered leg while a bald eagle's legs will be bare, Hinten said.

"By a bald eagle's fifth season, their heads are totally white and their tail starts turning white," Hinten said. "A lot of people thinks it happens simultaneously, but that's not true," he added.

"As they mature, their bones shrink and they become regular eagles," he said.

Until they mature, bald eagles will stay by themselves. When they are 4½ to 5 years old, the females will choose their mates for life and they will do a courtship ritual, Hinten said.

"The courtship ritual itself begins right about now, amid February probably, and it lasts clear up until March," Hinten said.

"Sometimes some pairs will mate for 30 years and they use the same nests and every year they go through this courtship dance," Hinten said. "If they don't do that and the male doesn't bring the female presents, they will not mate," he added.

"The eagles start a big dance and if anybody ever sees this happen, don't think that the birds are fighting like I did," Hinten said.

EAGLES GOING through this courtship ritual fly 3,000- to 6,000 feet high in the sky, according to Hinten.

"Two eagles will be flying in circles and suddenly they will fly at each other and grasp talons while spreading their wings open," Hinten said. "Then they will drop, spiraling down in a lazy kind of float. When they get a little above the ground, they fly back up and do it over and over again."

While the eagles are going through this ritual, they will be slowly moving back north to the breeding grounds which are typicallly the southern belt of Alaska, Canada, Idaho, Montana, Oregon and northern parts of Minnesota around the Great Lakes, Hinten said.

He added that this courtship dance will last from all day to anywhere from four to six weeks.

For the first mating, after they reach the breeding grounds, the male will show the female six or seven potential nesting spots, according to Hinten.

"Finally she'll decide on one that's suitable to her. Then he'll bring her presents, things to make the nest out of — baseball bats, license plates, cornstalks, about anything he can think of," Hinten said.

"She'll place them around or throw them out. This lasts about two weeks. The first year they'll have a nest about 2 feet high and 4 feet in diameter with a little nest cup in the middle of it," Hinten said.

"Every year they do this and every year he brings her presents and she adds them to the nest," Hinten said.

When the nest is not in use the lower strata drops away so the pair has to rebuild it each year, he said.

ACCORDING TO a National Wildlife Federation pamphlet, a nest in St. Petersburg, Fla., was used for 30 consecutive years and was 20 feet high by 9½ feet in diameter. It weighed an estimated two and one half tons, Hinten explained.

'I don't know about you, but I get a weird tingly feeling when I see a bald eagle.'

Hinten said many times people ask him how to tell a male and female eagle apart.

"Unless I see two eagles right next to each other and it's pretty obvious that they're a pair, you can't tell," Hinten said.

Raptors, or birds of prey, exhibit what is called sexual dimophism, according to Hinten. The word dimophism means two shapes and two sizes, he said.

"A lot of people mistake dimophism to mean color, which isn't true. If you interpret it loosely enough, that could be true, but it does in fact mean two shapes," Hinten said.

Bill Rogenmoser said, "I'm people oriented and enjoy meeting people. I recognize the importance of listening and have always been a highly motivated person. I would support a general trend toward increasing our sense of personal responsibility as students."

William Craig, junior in computer science, said Student Senate has been willing to put too much money from student fees into projects such as the coliseum and has not been concerned enough about the quality of education at the University. He stressed the need for better representation in Topeka.

SCOTT LONG, junior in journalism and mass communications, acknowledged the need for communication between students and student government in his opening remarks.

"The student body president not only has to talk to students...he has to speak to other groups such as the faculty and the administration and, of course, the Kansas Legislature."

Jim Bob Morris, senior in management, listed his personality, his ability to cooperate with individuals and his "common sense" approach to the issues of student government as his main qualifications for student body president.

Kelly Presta, junior in political science, said experience is not a real reason to vote for a candidate.

"That's what we've done in the past. What's really important is what we (the candidates) want to do in the future," he said. He said students should examine the goals of each candidate before voting.

THE CANDIDATES' first question was how they perceived their duties as student body president.

Fisher said the main duties of the office would be to represent the students of K-State and to make the legislature aware of students' opinions.

Craig said the president should be the central figure representing the voice of the students in the legislature and that he should be actively involved in the day-to-day operation of the SGA.

Long said he saw the role of president as being a fit representative of the students to other groups (such as the legislature, faculty and administration).

Morris also believed that the first responsibility of the president lies with the students. He said the president should be the voice of and advocate for the students' views and take these views to the legislature.

PRESTA SAID that the president should "work for the betterment of the students in all regards."

The second question was how each plans to communicate with the off-campus students, if elected.

"The president has to make an effort to give them every opportunity to come in and talk to him," Fisher said. He also said the president should visit off-campus groups to get their views on issues.

Morris, also an off-campus student, wanted more activities for these students in order to get them more involved.

Presta said that by electing student senators by living group, off-campus students would be better represented. Under this plan, off-campus students would elect their representatives through Off-Campus Student Association (OCSA). He also proposed forming a living group council containing representatives from all living groups.

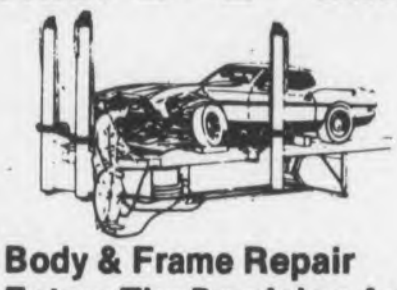
Senate committee kills bill on severance tax legislation



TOPEKA (AP) — The Senate Ways and Means Committee killed a bill Monday which would have imposed a severance tax on oil, natural gas and coal production — and not one legislator objected, not even the sponsor of the proposal.

Senate Minority Leader Jack Steineger (D-Kansas City, Kan.) joined in the death vote although he was the prime sponsor of the bill and is one of the strongest champions of the severance tax in the upper chamber.

This time he and other Democrats on the committee sided with Senate President Ross Doyen, a staunch opponent of any severance tax.

The catch, however, is that the bill is obsolete.

It was introduced in the 1981 session of the Legislature and embodied a plan passed by the House for a 5 percent tax on oil and gas, and 2 percent on coal.

Crunching of pencils-Tax season draws near Program offers help in filing income taxes

By STEWART BOWERSOX
Collegian Reporter

Subtract line 11 from line 10 — it's income tax time again.

Although figuring income tax can be difficult, there is free help available for students, according to Cindy Davis, coordinator of the Tax Assistance Program, sponsored by the Area Agency on Aging.

The Volunteer Income Tax Assistance (VITA) program is available this year at the Manhattan Public Library, Juliette and Poyntz, Davis said.

"Last year there was a VITA site on campus," Veryl Switzer, assistant vice president for minority affairs, said. "We regret not being able to offer this program on campus this year. The individual that we had trained to help students in filling out their tax forms is no longer with our department."

THE VITA SITE at the library is operated on a priority basis, Davis said.

The priority of the groups that are to be helped is established as elderly, handicapped and low-income individuals, respectively, Davis said.

"The students would be a part of the low-income bracket, but they would be the last group in our priority list," she said.

The VITA site has not been busy yet this year, according to Davis, which means that if students would get help now they would not have to wait long.

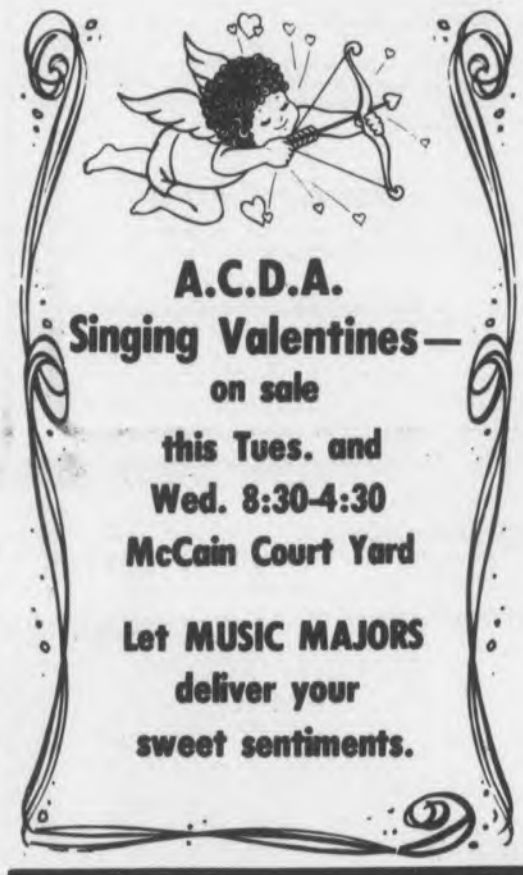
The VITA site is open Monday and Thursday from 9 a.m. to noon and from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m., until April 15.

THE VITA PROGRAM is set up to work with the Kansas Homestead Tax Refund, Kansas Food Sales Tax Refund, Earned Income Credit, Childcare Credit and simple wages, Davis said.

The types of federal income tax forms are the 1040 and 1040A. The 1040A "short form" is the form that will be used by most students, Kim Driesbach, accounting instructor for Taxation I, said.

The short form is filed by individuals at the low end of the income scale who do not itemize their deductions, Driesbach said.

A single student would not want to file a return if his income was $3,300 or less and no tax was withheld, and married students would not have to file a return if their income was $4,400 or less with no tax withheld, Driesbach explained.



IF A STUDENT has his W-2 form (wage and tax statement) he can sign his 1040A form and send it in to the Internal Revenue Service. The IRS will then figure his tax for him, according to Driesbach.

"I have never heard of anyone who has done it this way, but I am sure that if all you had was your W-2 form the tax would be figured fairly," she said.

"If you are using the short form it is very easy to follow the directions on the form and do the filing of your own taxes," Davis said, "but if you need assistance we are glad to help anyone who is categorized as elderly, handicapped and low-income."

A student wishing to use the VITA program needs to bring his tax form, W-2 form, documents that show any deductions, and forms that state the amount of interest, if any was earned over the year, to the VISTA site, Davis said.

Judging team places fourth at Texas show

The livestock judging team earned fourth place overall in the Southwestern Livestock Exposition Friday and Saturday in Fort Worth, Texas.

The group competed against 18 teams and followed first place Colorado, Oklahoma State, second, and Texas Tech, third. K-State claimed second in swine, third in sheep and sixth in cattle competition.

Rodney Mein, junior in agriculture education, placed second individually in the sheep competition.

There are 15 members on the spring judging team and three different groups are selected for each of the three meets.

The team placed seventh overall at the Midwestern Stock Show Jan. 16 in Denver, Colo., but battled against 27 teams at that meet.

K-State's program is unique in that it uses three completely different teams each meet, according to Bill Able, associate professor of animal science and livestock judging coach.

"In the junior program, K-State is the only school in the country that takes out three completely different teams," Able said.

The spring team does not work out until December as does Colorado who has won the last two meets, according to Able.

The team will be Texas-bound once again for the third and final meet March 5 at the Houston Livestock Show.

In nearly all raptors, Hinten said, the female is larger than the male because she is the principal defender of the nest and the young birds.

The males are smaller and more agile so they can fly faster and supply the nest with more food, according to Hinten.

Bald eagles will lay their eggs the second week in March, Hinten said.

The young eaglets will fledge (have enough feathers for flight) when they are from 12 to 18 weeks old, according to Hinten.

"They will remain with the parents a couple months longer so they can learn to hunt and how to be eagles," Hinten said.

"Then in late October or early November they're kicked out when the parents begin to migrate back south," he added.

While traveling from one area to another, Hinten reminded some of class members that President Reagan has declared 1982 the "year of the eagle" because this is the 200th anniversary of the eagle being officially adopted as the national symbol.

Bald eagles have had two problems plaguing their population, according to Hinten.

"In 1917 the federal government issued a bounty of $100 for every eagle shot. Between 1917 and 1952, 100,000 eagles were killed. About that same time, in the mid-1950s, DDT came into use," Hinten said.

The whole problem with DDT, Hinten stressed, came from misuse of the chemical, or using too much.

DDT affected the food chain, he said, giving an example of rabbits eating grasshoppers that had died from DDT. A coyote would eat the dead rabbits and die. Then the eagle would come along and eat the coyote. Either he would die or mutations would occur in following generations. Or, Hinten said, the egg shells would be too thick or thin.

DDT was banned in 1972, he said.

"Last year there were 9,500 bald eagles counted in the lower 48 states. So the population is increasing," he said.

Students gave various reasons for taking the class.

Andy Sandler, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, took the class because he enjoys bird-watching.

It was a bitterly cold day to be out and many of the class members complained of cold feet. But something about seeing that bald eagle by the Blue River made them forget and stare in awe.

Perhaps Hinten summed it up best.

"I don't know about you, but I get a wierd tingly feeling when I see a bald eagle."

Infractions shorten ballot

By LESLIE PHELPS
Government Affairs Editor

Nineteen candidates running for Student Senate positions and one candidate for Board of Student Publications have had their names removed from the ballot in today's election.

Last night, the 1982 Elections Committee passed a motion removing any candidate's name from the ballot if the candidate missed the expenditure report deadline which was 5 p.m. Tuesday for Student Senate and Board of Student Publications positions. These candidates had one expenditure report to submit for their entire campaign.

Candidates who failed to turn in their expenditure report on time are still eligible to run in the election, but they will be considered write-in candidates because their name will not be on the ballot, said Gayla Backman, Elections Committee chairman and senior in home economics education.

All candidates signed a statement when filing for office agreeing to meet the requirements of the campaign expenditure regulations. One of these regulations was to meet the campaign expenditure report deadline. The deadline was also announced at the mandatory candidate meeting. In addition, all candidates received a report form that listed the due dates and expenditure lids for their respective offices, Backman said.

The committee also discussed penalties for candidates who exceed their campaign expenditure lids. They voted unanimously to invalidate candidates who exceed their campaign expenditure lids.

Following the election, the committee will review each candidate's campaign expenditure reports and make sure no expenditure lids were exceeded.

Commission approves senior citizens center

During a special meeting Tuesday afternoon, Manhattan City Commissioners voted unanimously to build the much talked about senior citizens center.

The $27,500 financial shortfall needed to build the center will be divided between city and county funds. Plans to construct the center were delayed until commitments from both city and county commissioners were made to provide matching funds. Riley County commissioners approved the expenditure of $13,750 Thursday following funding pleas from several Manhattan senior citizens who attended the meeting at the Riley County Courthouse.

Bob McAdoo, president of the Riley County Council on Aging, expressed his appreciation to city commissioners for their support of the center following the unanimous vote.

The contract was awarded to Baril Construction Company, Manhattan, which submitted the low bid of $254,316. The center will be located at Fourth and Leavenworth.

In other business, commissioners discussed two applications for Community Energy Grants available to the city by the State Energy Office. One application involved a study of the Manhattan traffic signal system energy consumption at a cost of about $25,000. The application was defeated by the commissioners. The other application, involving an $8,000 grant to fund the study of energy conservation in city-owned buildings, was approved.

In a work session following the meeting, commissioners discussed the 1981 Water Works Improvement Report. The major portion of the report deals with adding to the present water plant capacity. Black and Veatch, an engineering firm in Kansas City, Mo., drew up a proposal of alternative financing plans if the city decides to engage in a water works improvement project.

Debate among commissioners focused on whether the public would rather pay more for a maximum capacity water plant or suffer water restrictions if it is not made available. Commissioners are expected to decide whether or not the city will enter into a contract with Black and Veatch for the water improvement program at their next meeting on Tuesday.

Critics of budget deficits shape spending freeze plan

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) — President Reagan, winding up a kickoff sales trip for his latest economic program, declared Tuesday he has yet to witness a better product offered by critics who should "put up or shut up."

But in Washington, there was no diminishing of the outcry, from foe and even friend, over his big-deficit scenario for the new fiscal year. One key Democrat, in fact, did put up — with a plan to freeze expenditures and junk the 1983 phase of the president's tax cut.

And even Senate Republican Leader Howard Baker Jr., a longtime Reagan loyalist, found that alternative — particularly the idea of holding spending to 1982 levels — "intriguing."

The president, on a two-day trip to the Midwest, complained that even before he announced the 1983 budget, calling for a deficit of $91.5 billion, "you could hear the sound of knees jerking all over Washington. The knee-jerk reaction and instant analysis are as hasty as they were incorrect."

Meanwhile, Reagan's chief economic strategists were buffeted by Republicans and Democrats alike as they opened the administration's pitch for the $757.6 billion package on Capitol Hill. House Republican Leader Robert Michel of Illinois listened to Budget Director David Stockman and Treasury Secretary Donald Regan, then pronounced the deficit "mind-boggling...hard to swallow."

In the Senate, Democrat Ernest Hollings of the Budget Committee was said to be shaping a counter-plan which would freeze spending on social and defense programs at 1982 levels — Reagan wants a big boost for the Pentagon — and scuttle the cut in 1983 of another 10 percent in income taxes. Baker, while making it clear he does not yet support any specific change in the three-year tax cut, called the idea of a spending freeze "most interesting."

Reagan, in an address to the Indiana Legislature, said, "We will not play hopscotch economics, jumping here and jumping there as the daily situation changes. To the paid political complainers, let me say as politely as I can: Put up or shut up."

In Iowa, an estimated 1,200 people marched in sub-zero temperatures to protest Reagan's policies as he addressed the Legislature.

Tutors rely on actions, newspapers to teach foreign students English

By HEIDI BRIGHT
Collegian Reporter

How would you explain the word "goblin" to a foreigner, or the words "blew" and "too?" These challenges face both tutors and students in the Conversational English Program, sponsored by the Foreign Student Office.

Recalling the time he tried to communicate to one foreign student what an ape is brought a twinkle to the eyes of Curt Musil, building supervisor for the International Student Center and a coordinator of the tutoring program.

Musil said he tried for "20 to 25 minutes" to describe and mimic an ape. Finally a picture of an ape in National Geographic solved the mystery for the international student.

Similarly, the word "too" proved challenging for Donna Davis, assistant foreign student adviser and full-time coordinator of the tutoring program.

FIRST DAVIS POURED a lot of sugar into a cup of coffee and said "too sweet" to a group of four Nigerian women.

Unsure if she got the meaning across, she donned a coat too large for her and said, "Too big." Then donning a small coat she said, "Too small."

In the end, she said, "The light went on. Somebody just finally realized what I was doing."

Goals for the tutoring program consist of improving the students' English, conversational skills, and promoting friendships and cultural exchanges between the students and tutors.

One teaching aspect is to allow the students to practice English in an informal atmosphere. This enables the students to "overcome shyness and develop confidence and fluency."

DURING A TYPICAL session with Davis, an Iranian couple, Rahim and Badri, sat around a small table drinking coffee. Their conversation drifted from new words they had picked up, to food and hobbies. Occasionally their casual laughter would put warm smiles on their faces.

While reading a newspaper, Davis pointed out new words and phrases to the couple. Davis also explained differences in words spelled similarly.

The couple took notes and Davis ended the session with an assignment for them to read a newspaper article.

The students in the program range from beginners who only know words like "yes" and "hello," to "advanced students" who want to learn to "speak Kansan."

Many students doing advanced research in other fields often "have a lot more problems" with the language than most of the other students enrolled in the Conversational English Program, Davis said. They can read and write, but have trouble speaking English.

An article appearing in the Feb. 8 issue of the Collegian stated parking lot number 27 was sealed and revamped to include a triangle in the center at a cost of $9,994. This was the estimated cost. Actual cost of the repair work was $3,627. The purpose of the triangle was a landscaping opportunity, but it was also the best practical layout design for parking stalls, according to Gene Cross, vice-president of University Facilities.

Farmer refuses to testify in contempt case

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — A Missouri farmer refused to answer 19 questions Tuesday at a federal bankruptcy court hearing on whether he should be held in contempt of court.

Wayne Cryts, 35, of Puxico, Mo., said he did not reply because the statements would incriminate him. He said he had the right under the Fifth Amendment to refuse.

"I guess I'm in contempt," Cryts said while on the stand. "I've done my best not to be contemptible. I've tried to be an American, to stand up to an injustice. I wish we could get this farce over with. Do what you're going to do."

Judge Charles Baker recessed the hearing without making a contempt ruling. He said he would ask the U.S. attorney to seek a District Court order guaranteeing Cryts immunity from prosecution.

Robert Lindsey of Little Rock, trustee for a bankrupt chain of grain elevators in Arkansas and Missouri, asked for the contempt orders. He said Cryts and others took 33,000 bushels of soybeans from the New Madrid, Mo., elevator Feb. 16, 1981, while the grain was under the court-ordered control of the trustee.

Bank guard kills robber in holdup

KANSAS CITY, Mo — A bank guard killed a holdup man in a shootout which erupted minutes after another guard was wounded at the downtown facility Tuesday, police said.

Police said Lonnie Boggess, 26, of Kansas City, was dead on arrival at Truman Medical Center.

Boggess entered the United Missouri Bank shortly after 10 a.m., put a 25-caliber automatic to the head of one of the guards, and announced a holdup, according to Sgt. Jim Treece, a police spokesman.

The guard, identified as Robert Williams, 59, attempted to grab the gun and the two struggled, Treece said. Williams, who was reported in good condition, was wounded in the neck when the Boggess' gun discharged.

The second guard then exchanged shots with Boggess, striking him twice in the chest. Boggess fired at least three shots at the guard, who was not identified as prosecutors reviewed the case.

Professor heads new crime committee

TOPEKA — Former Shawnee County District Judge Michael Barbara will head a newly created Governor's Committee on Crime Prevention.

Gov. John Carlin Tuesday created the committee by executive order.

The committee, which includes law enforcement professionals, judges, attorney and public members, will focus on improving local crime prevention programs.

Barbara, now a law professor at Washburn University, said no date has been set for an initial meeting of the committee. Members will serve without compensation.

Last year Barbara headed the Committee on Professional Negotiations which made major recommendations in the teacher bargaining law.

Official calls charity drawing illegal

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A drawing for a $130,000 house will be delayed while promoters revise the rules to satisfy objections of the state attorney general's office.

Angela Bennett, an assistant attorney general, said the plan promoted by Richard Emrich, a Kansas City advertising man, was illegal because it contained all three elements of a lottery — money paid, chance and a prize.

"I don't think there was any attempt on their part to defraud or participate in a lottery. They readily agreed to comply with the ruling," Bennett said after a meeting with promoters Monday.

Proceeds from the sale of $50 tickets for the drawing, originally scheduled for late this month, were to go to Emrich to cover the purchase price of his Liberty residence and to help finance a $5.6 million addition to Park Lane Medical Center.

Tests run smoothly for shuttle launch

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Technicians expect to complete tests on space shuttle Columbia in time to roll it to its launch pad by Feb. 17, four days ahead of schedule, Mark Hess, Kennedy Space Center spokesman, said Tuesday.

"It doesn't look, at this point, as if we'll have any trouble making the 17th," Hess said.

"We've had very few problems. So far, all have been the result of ground support equipment or minor things quickly resolved."

The testing of all power and communications links between the orbiter and its two major auxiliary components — the huge external fuel tank and twin booster rockets — is expected to be completed Thursday.

Three mission simulations are scheduled for Friday and Saturday in the Vehicle Assembly Building, where the tests are being carried out before the move to the luanch site.

Hess said astronauts Jack Lousma and Gordon Fullerton, the crew for Columbia's third mission, will conduct two of the mock missions and their back-up crew, Vance Brand and Bob Overmeyer, the third.

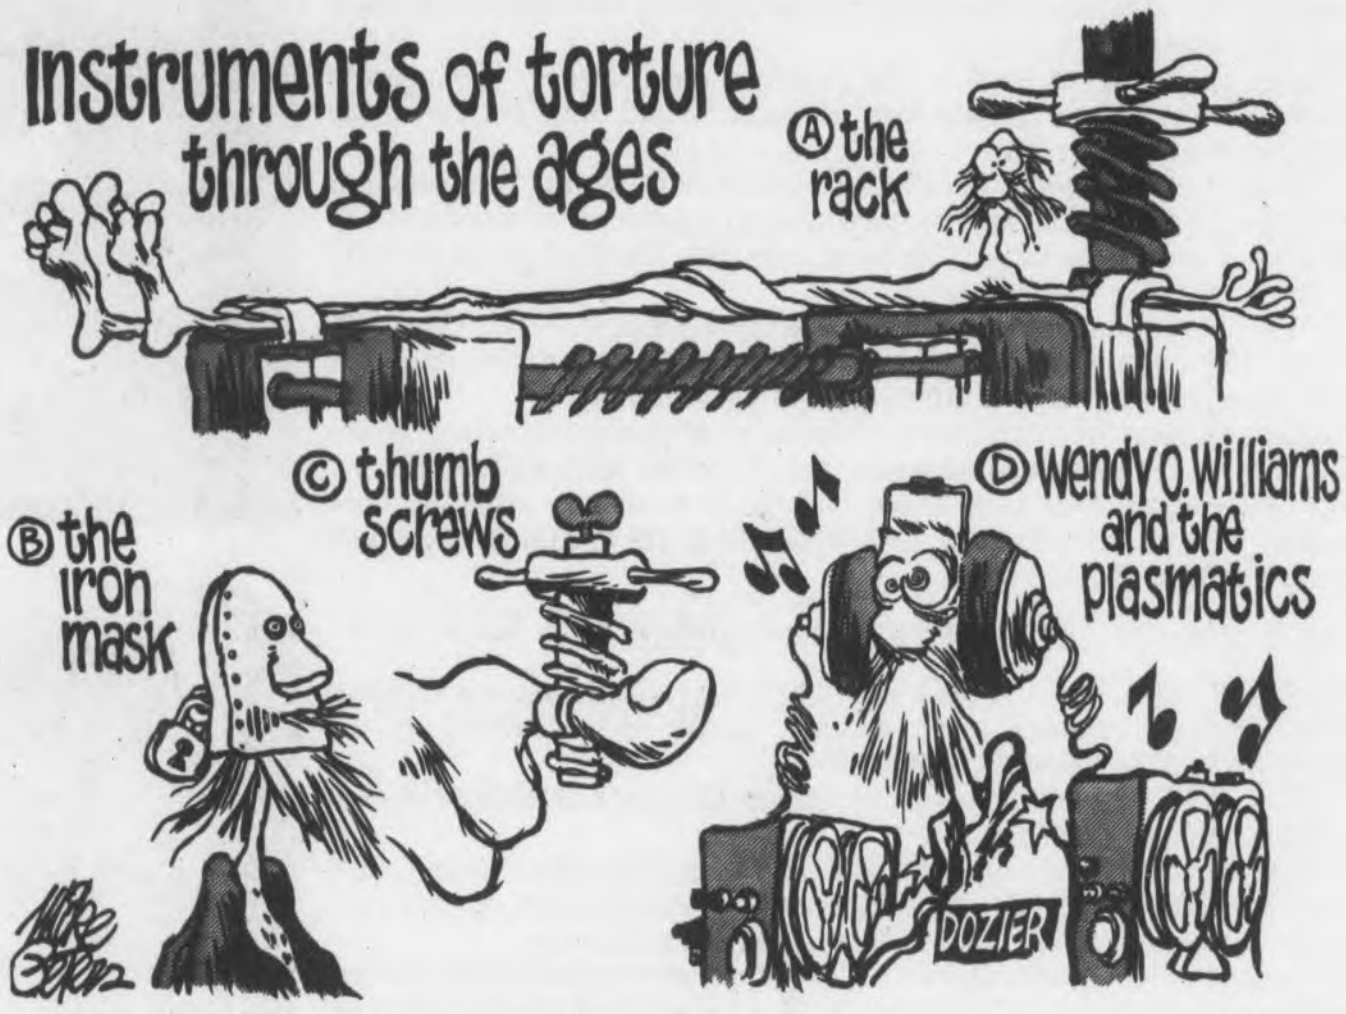
Council elections equally important



Included in today's ballot race for student body president, student senate, college councils and Board of Student Publications are elections for a council which will aid the representation over half of the student population, those who live off-campus.

The Off-Campus Student Association (OCSA) is a relatively new organization seeking to establish a line of communication for the thousands of students living beyond the campus boundaries. Seven positions are open on the OCSA council and ten candidates have been declared.

The council has been cited as as a link between off-campus students and Student Senate. Its importance is verified by the fact that approximately half of the present student senators are members of living groups. The concerns and issues of the living groups, on-campus and off-campus students vary and the OCSA council may help in rectifying this imbalance, one that appears to be presently insoluble.

If off-campus students feel their concerns are not represented by the elected college senators, then a vote for a candidate seeking a position on the unadvertised OCSA council may provide the delegate forum they need.

Chairman 'disgraced'

Editor,

As a student concerned over campus issues I attended the "Let's talk about it...SGA with Doug Dodds and student body president forum."

I understood the purpose of the forum was to listen to the candidates and their platforms.

I was shocked and appalled when the Senate Chairman, Doug Dodds, attacked one candidate on a personal issue. In the history of student government, no senate chairman has ever taken a stand for or against any candidate. By doing so, for personal reasons, Dodds disgraced himself and his office.

Visit the ballot box

Editor,

As elections are upon us and the campaigning is winding down, many candidates may be wondering how many students will come out to vote. In the past, there have been few student voters. Some may say students are lazy, others say there are no issues and students don't care.

Apathetic. That's the word that comes up after elections, the students are apathetic. But I for one don't think that is necessarily the case.

I once had the chance to talk with Bernard Franklin, a former K-Stater who ran as a write-in candidate for student body president, and until recently, was chairman of the Board of Regents. I asked him how to encourage the apathetic student to be involved.

His reply was that students aren't apathetic. Rather, their interests are merely directed toward other things. To get people involved, one has to present them with reasons why their interest should be directed differently.

It made sense to me. I want to try to direct interest to the elections. Many college council elections, as well as student body president, Board of Student Publications, student senate and off-campus council elections, are taking place. A student is probably affected by more than one of these groups and will be represented by peers that want to be a student voice. What they do after elections reflects back to all, not just the ones that voted.

If you don't think that anyone can represent you well enough then get involved yourself. Write in your own name to let it be known that interest is there, but not for any particular candidate. Vote!

Life's long journey has a short ending

There once lived a man named Jim Rinne.

You won't find his life story in the pages of history books, or his name in flashing neon lights. But nevertheless his life has been permanently etched into the hearts of many, including mine.

Rev. Jim Rinne had a remarkable gift of reaching out and grabbing life, of making the most of every precious moment. He was the kind of person who lived life to its very fullest. He touched people's lives in a way no one ever had or ever will again.

He spent a good portion of his life working with and for the mentally retarded — and battling the disease of cancer.

HIS WORK with the retarded mirrored his belief that "they're more like us than unlike us." As administrator of a home for mentally retarded adults, he opened new doors for its residents and shared with them his zest for life.

His fight with cancer ended in May. After 13 years of treatment after treatment, Rev. Rinne succumbed to a deadly, relentless enemy.

It was his death that caused me to think about the many people I know whose lives have been disrupted by the unwelcome intrusion of cancer. One out of every four Americans will die of some form of cancer. The chances are, each one of us will somehow, directly or indirectly, be touched by the disease and its aftermath.

Not long after Rev. Rinne's death I learned that one of my good friends and classmates also suffered from cancer, and was struggling to fight the weakening side effects of chemotherapy.

BILL IS ONLY 20 years old. He has a little boy, a wife...and a fatal disease.

While the rest of us are making plans for the future Bill will be hoping he has a future.

Cancer's fatal sting touches so many. It knows no boundaries. It can reach out and snatch the very young and the very old, the rich, the poor. It destroys lives and dreams. It claims lives of wonderful people like Rev. Rinne, who has given so much. It disrupts lives of people like Bill, who has just begun to live.

All too often life (or is it death?) just doesn't seem fair. I feel so angry when I think of the millions of lives lost to cancer, a disease which has persistently evaded researchers looking for its cause and cure.

THE REALIZATION that we are not immortal fails to lessen the pain of words never spoken and moments never shared because death cruelly intervenes.

Its hard to think that anything good could result from death because it usually hurts so much. But now I realize that death reminds us not to forget about life. We get so bogged down with meeting deadlines and "getting ahead" we forget what life is all about. A term paper handed in three weeks before it's due can hardly replace a long conversation with an old friend. A new car is a poor substitute for time spent with the family.

I for one am going to try to stop taking life for granted and make the most of my time here. The effort would be universally worthwhile.

Beauty, beast contest benefits radio station

Alpha Phi Omega (APO), a coed service fraternity, will be conducting voting for its 12th annual Beauty and the Beast contest today through Friday.

All proceeds from this year's contest will go to KSDB, John McDermott, alumni member of APO, said.

Pictures of couples depicting the theme of "Beauty and the Beast" will be attached to jars placed in the Union, McDermott said. People can vote for their favorite couple by dropping coins in the jar of the picture they like best.

"All the members from both houses (fraternities and sororities) try to see what kind of money they can come up with," McDermott said.

There are eight teams competing this year, including one off-campus team, according to Dave Bussen, APO publicity chairman and junior in family and child development.

The controversy was focused on the content of some of the pictures, and McDermott added, "We don't expect any problems this year.

"It is in one of our rules that we reserve the right to screen photos, and if any of them promoted violence we told them to come back in different costumes," Bussen said.

APO is in charge of the bulletin boards in the Union and on campus and also supervises the Lost and Found in the Union.

Tutors

THE STUDENTS' motivation is "extremely high.

"It's a matter of survival," Davis said.

Doris Bracho, the wife of a graduate student from Venezuela, said, "For me it's very useful...It's an excellent idea."

Some foreign students also see friendships growing from their experiences with their tutors.

"After several times (meeting with her tutor), I felt she was my friend, and not just my tutor... I feel very comfortable with her," said Hsao-Ying Tiao, graduate in computer science from the Republic of China.

Several professors offer tutoring as a service project for credit in certain classes, Waldner said. This is why many Americans become tutors.

The international students need to be tutored every day, and despite the 41 tutors involved in the program, Davis needs more.

"We never have enough..." Davis said. "We could be tutoring around the clock."

Something To Think About . . . Scott Long

AS YOU VOTE TODAY IN THE STUDENT ELECTIONS

We Believe there are some responsibilities that the Student Body President must perform that some students may not be aware of. The Student Body President must deal with issues during the campaign, but more importantly he must solve problems as they arise throughout his term of office. We need a Student Body President who is an experienced leader; one who has been actively involved and realizes the magnitude of the Student Body President's duties.

Student Body President's Responsibilities:

1) Communicate with Students
2) Work with faculty
3) Work with administrators
4) Be open to the Statehouse
5) Attend Kansas Board of Regents meetings
6) Participate in Student Advisory Council
7) Work with student lobby groups
8) Represent students and the university at alumni events

Scott Long's Experience:

1) Chairman of Student Senate Communication Committee and made more visitations than any other student senator
2) Has attended and addressed Faculty Senate
3) Has served on University Committees and attended and addressed the Administrative Council
4) Has met with the Governor and Legislators to discuss student issues
5) Has attended Board of Regents meetings and spoken with individual Regents
6) Has attended and spoken at Student Advisory Council meetings
7) Has taken an active role in A.S.K. and sponsored resolutions concerning student financial aid and tuition increases
8) Has attended and spoken at such alumni events.

We don't need a candidate who creates issues, we need a Student Body President who works to solve problems.

"You can't beat experience in the Long run."

House restores funding to benefit unemployed

WASHINGTON (AP) — Republicans and Democrats swapped charges on the House floor Tuesday about who was to blame for the recession, then joined forces to approve President Reagan's plan for an additional $2.3 billion for benefits and services for the unemployed.

The vote was 398-3 to approve the measure and send it to the Senate.

The jobless benefits bill amounted to a change in Reagan's economic plan, as well. About $210 million of the $2.3 billion total would restore cuts made last year in spending for job service workers.

Even though final approval for the jobless benefits bill was a certainty, members of both parties used the occasion for a partisan political debate.

"This recession started in 1978 (when Jimmy Carter was in the White House)," said Rep. Robert S. Walker (R-Pa.)

"And we've been on a downward path ever since," he added.

But Walker's assessment of the current deep recession didn't sit well with Rep. David Bonior (D-Mich.)

"If the gentleman thinks the recession started in 1978, I have a used car I'd like to sell him," Bonior said.

The president was forced to ask Congress for additional money for jobless benefits because unemployment has grown considerably more than the administration originally forecast.

Unemployment was 8.5 percent of the work force last month, and the Labor Department estimated that 9.2 million Americans were out of work.

Reagan's request to Congress called for $1.95 billion in new advances from the federal government to the states, whose own unemployment reserves have run low. It is the state governments that actually distribute unemployment benefits.

The president's proposal also includes another $210 million for employment service workers who attempt to help the out-of-work find jobs.

Magician's mirages baffle audience

By SHERRY SCHMITT
Collegian Reporter

An act that made Houdini famous 100 years ago was performed last night in David Seebach's Wonders of Magic show in McCain Auditorium.

A sturdy wooden case on both the inside and outside held center stage. Seebach tied June, one of his assistants, in a black sack already placed inside the case. Siberian transfer handcuffs were locked on her wrists. Then she was locked inside of the case with five padlocks securing the lid shut. A red-and-white striped dressing-room curtain was held around and above the case.

Seebach stood on top of the case and counted quickly to three. At the endof the three seconds, to the audience's amazement, Seebach had changed places with his assistant. She was free for the audience to see.

WITH THE HELP of another assistant, June unlocked the padlocks, untied the black sack, and Seebach revealed himself, bound by the handcuffs. This took place in a matter of seconds while the crowd cheered in disbelief.

A volunteer from the audience was needed for one act, and Tim Hanson, a 12 year old from Manhattan Middle School readily went forward. Hanson admitted to being nervous in front of the large crowd. But his gestures kept the audience laughing and applauding. When a guillotine was set up on the stage Hanson gestured to the audience, showing his sudden fear.

Seebach took a head of lettuce and peeled away the outer leaves until it was about the same size as Hanson's head. Hanson gulped. Seebach placed the head of lettuce on the guillotine, guaranteeing that the lettuce would remain in one piece. Dropping the sharp cutting blade, Seebach's promise was broken. Hanson gulped harder.

THE AUDIENCE WAS laughing nervously as Hanson was placed on his knees with his head in the cut-out groove. Hanson formed his hands as if praying and bowed his head.

Seebach started counting to three. At the end of count two, he stopped — releasing the audience's tension — and brought forth a newspaper. He showed the headline "David Seebach Has Accident." Laughter continued uproariously as Hanson read the article. He kept reading it over and over, continuing to act as if he were praying.

After several more attempts of counting to three, Seebach said, "Three" and let the blade drop. Although no one really expected Hanson's head to be cut off, a sigh of release filled the auditorium.

THE BEGINNING ACT opened with an explosion that left members of audience jumping in their chairs. Starting with a purple scarf, Seebach pulled a red scarf, then a blue, next a green, a yellow and continuing until a multi-colored scarf emerged. Finally when a large number of scarves were in his hands, he placed them into a glass box. After putting a glimmering cloth of silver threads around it, he twirled the box. Upon removing the cloth, not only had the scarves disappeared, but one of his lady assistants was inside the box.

Keeping the audience in awe, he took a small wooden box and showed it was empty. However, he reached into the box and pulled out three white hankerchiefs. As if this were not magic enough, he placed the hankies in a clear drinking glass. When he pulled them out, one had become red, one white, and the other blue.

CONTINUING WITH this act, he placed the three colored hankies inside a blue plastic box. The first time he pulled these out, one was blue, the other had red-and-white stripes. After several other wrong mixtures, a small American flag appeared, met with a large round of applause. One more time Seebach placed his creation in the box. Finally he pulled a large flag out of the box.

The next act was a common one done by magicians — a disappearing and reappearing rabbit. Continuing his patriotic theme, Seebach used red, white and blue boxes. The rabbit was put in the blue box and the white box was put inside the red box. A baby blanket was put over the box with the rabbit inside. When Seebach removed the blanket, the expected had happened — the blue box was gone. He went over to the other side of the stage where the red box was and discovered the blue box inside the white box. And inside of all of these boxes, was none other than the white rabbit, with dark paws and ears.

STAYING IN THE realm of boxes, Seebach next used one with a small squeegee protruding from it. When Seebach turned the squeegee, to the audience's horror, a flat paper image of a rabbit came out. Putting this image into a box with a tire pump, Seebach proceeded to pump air into the box. What had been a flat image became the live rabbit.

Seebach said people often wonder how he and his team travel with all of their large scenery, props and animals. The audience laughed when he said that everyone and everything traveled in one two-door Chevy Nova.

His next act showed how this was possible. An unusual looking contraption was the only prop used. When this machine was turned on, red, yellow and white blinking lights greeted the audience. Midge, a Barbie doll was put inside the machine. When the doll came out, through a process of levers and a compression circuit, Midge was as flat as a piece of paper. She had become a compact paper doll.

Seebach said this solved the touring problem and proceeded to put June, his assistant, inside the box. In a few seconds, out came a paper doll image of June. Life size. The machine also seemed to have the ability to design costumes and bring the image back to a three-dimensional figure. Seebach demonstrated these techniques as the audience tried to unravel the mystery.

Faculty Senate policy toughens requirements

Attention landscape architecture students. It's time to hit the books and pull out the drawing table because a "D" won't do anymore.

Faculty Senate passed a notation Tuesday stating "all required courses taught in the landscape architecture department which are counted toward the degree must be passed with a grade of 'C' or better." This notation will be added to the Course & Curriculum for the College of Architecture and Design.

"The department wanted their students to be qualified before going to work," Larry Cindrich, professor in pre-design professions, said.

"If a landscape architect was working my grounds, it would be fine if he made A's and B's in everything else, but if he made a 'D' in drainage, my basement wouldn't be in good shape," said Eugene Friedmann, head of the Department of Sociology and Anthropology.

Thomas Musiak, head of the landscape architecture department, said that the new policy applies only to students working for their bachelor of landscape architecture degree and in the landscape architecture classes.

The objective for the notation is to maintain a professional level for graduates, Musiak said.

After a lengthy discussion, the proposed policy was referred back to the Academic Affairs Committee for revisions to be made and discussed at a later meeting.

The faculty also expressed objections to the proposed increase in faculty and staff parking fees and voted on a recommended fee policy and schedule to be considered.

The policy recommended that the faculty, staff and students only be assessed for the annual cost of maintaining parking lots, Friedmann said.

The policy also states that visitor, vendors, state vehicles, basketball lot parking and athletic contributors share the maintenance costs. A metered lot is suggested for visitor parking, Friedmann said.

Faculty Senate suggested that appropriate future increases in misuse fees also be used as a way of off-setting increases in user fees.

An amendment to the policy concerning course description publications was also discussed at the meeting.

The course descriptions need more flexibility to allow communications to those students who do not have access to the verbal communications of on-campus students, said Bo Vallance, assistant professor of continuing education.

Wildcats aim to halt Sooners' winning streak

The men's basketball team will try to snap Oklahoma's 10-game home-court winning streak tonight. The Wildcats, 16-4 and 6-2 in conference play, are ranked 15th in the Associated Press basketball poll.

The Wildcats are coming off a 65-58 victory over Colorado. Oklahoma, 4-4 in the league and 13-7 overall, defeated Iowa State 85-69 on the road Saturday. Sooners' Head Coach Billy Tubbs said the game with K-State could be a measuring stick determining his team's improvement to date.

"We've definitely made an improvement over last year, but we have a long way to go," Tubbs said. "We have tremendous respect for K-State, particularly its strong front line. It's going to be a tough game."

Chuck Barnett leads Oklahoma in scoring with 18.5 points per game and has scored 70 points in his last four outings against the Wildcats. The Sooners' David Little is averaging 17.3 points.

Tubbs pointed out that K-State's early season victory over the Sooners (47-42) was not the typical style of play for the two teams.

"The first game was very conservative in the second half. I'm sure it (today's game) will be a different game, one with a faster tempo," he said.

In the first contest against the Sooners, K-State shot only 39 percent from the field. Head Coach Jack Hartman said the Sooners got their message across in that game.

"They have already proven that they are a much better basketball team than people had expected. We certainly found that out in Manhattan," Hartman said.

For the Wildcats, Randy Reed is leading in scoring with an average of 16 points per game while Tyrone Adams is pumping in 14.5 points a game. Ed Nealy is scoring 12.6 points and has an average of 8.4 rebounds per game. Also for the Wildcats is Tim Jankovich who is shooting 63 percent from the field in conference games while seeing all but one minute of play in the last four games.

Nealy's rebounding efforts have moved him into fifth place on the all-time Big Eight list with a total of 979 falling short of Dean Uthoff with 1,233 rebounds. Uthoff is a 1980 Iowa State graduate.

The Wildcats have been victorious in the last three meetings with Oklahoma, giving them a 75-71 series advantage over the Sooners.

In other conference games, Iowa State travels to Colorado and Oklahoma State visits Nebraska.

MU tops 'Hawks 42-41

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Forward Ricky Frazier has had a touch of the flu — but both he and the Missouri basketball team got well Tuesday night.

Frazier scored 20 points, and the fourth-ranked Tigers used a relentless stall game to hang on for a 42-41 victory over Kansas in Big Eight basketball.

"This team doesn't like to make excuses, but Ricky Frazier has been sick for 10 days," said Missouri Coach Norm Stewart after his team bounced back from its only loss of the season, a 67-51 defeat by Nebraska Saturday night. "He has had an upset stomach and he didn't even practice yesterday."

Missouri scored only 12 points in the final half and none after Frazier's two free throws gave the Tigers a 42-38 lead with 8:39 left.

But Kansas managed only three points during that span as Missouri went into a stall in an effort to spread the Jayhawks' 2-3 zone defense.

"We wanted to keep them away from the basket so that we'd have a little more opportunity to get it to the basket," said Stewart. "When they (Kansas) stood packed in there 15 feet from the hole, we're not going to get the good shot."

Despite the Missouri stall, Kansas still had a chance to win the game when David Magley rebounded a missed free throw by Marvin "Moon" McCrary with 45 seconds left.

After a Kansas timeout, Tony Guy inbounded a pass to Jeff Dishman with 37 seconds left, and the Jayhawks ran the clock down for a final shot. But a pass to Mark Summers was slapped away, and after a wild scramble, Missouri's Steve Stipanovich came up with the loose ball as time expired.

"Tony was supposed to go underneath by a screen," said Kansas Coach Ted Owens. "However, McCrary went above the screen, and we were unable to get Tony the basketball."

Frazier, celebrating his 24th birthday, scored 10 of his points in the second half.

The victory improved Missouri's overall record to 20-1 and boosted the Tigers to 9-1 in the Big Eight. Kansas, dropping its third straight game, fell to 12-9 and 3-6.

Conference hits WSU, ratifies new sanctions

TULSA, Okla. (AP) — The Missouri Valley Conference ordered new sanctions against Wichita State University's basketball program Tuesday for infractions found earlier by the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA).

Wichita State was placed on three years probation by the NCAA and prohibited from participating in post-season play in 1982 and 1983.

Under the conference order, the Shockers also will be prohibited from competing in the Valley's post-season basketball tournament during those two years.

In addition, they will not receive their share of revenue distributed by the conference from basketball during the 1982 post-season play and the 1982-1983 academic year, and will forfeit one share of any revenue received from their televised non-conference games during the same period.

The conference sanctions were ratified by a joint committee of athletic directors and faculty representatives.

Wichita State did not appeal the ruling.

"After a complete review of the findings and sanctions of the NCAA Committee on Infractions, it was felt the action taken by the Compliance Committee (of the conference) was both meaningful and appropriate," Dick Martin, Valley commissioner, said.

"The purpose of our post-season tournament is to determine the conference's representatives to the NCAA tournament. Since Wichita State is not eligible to compete in that tournament, it was felt it would not be appropriate for it to participate in the conference tournament."

Day care center to open in dome at Industrial Park

By JOY CULVER
Collegian Reporter

Parents who work in the Manhattan Industrial Park will soon have a unique day-care center available for their children.

The center will be housed in the dome-shaped building now under construction. Not only is it the only monolithic dome structure in the area, but it will also serve as one of the few day-care centers in a Midwest industrial park.

Henry Otto Jr., Manhattan attorney and part owner of Child Care Management Inc., said the day-care center is a new concept in the Midwest. Not many day-care centers are built to cater to a large group of workers, he said.

Otto and his partners, Mark Stallings and Eric Peck, wanted to build the center in a location that would be convenient for parents as they drive to work. They picked the Industrial Park, hoping to attract parents who work in the area.

"We looked at the market and decided that between all the employees in the Industrial Park area, there are enough children to justify one small day-care center," Otto said.

OTTO JOINED his partners, Stallings and Peck, about a year after they had gone into the day-care center business. They were unsatisfied with available day-care facilities and wanted to make some improvements.

However, the idea of building a day-care center from the ground up appealed to the partners. While investigating this idea they approached Otto who also agreed there was a need for the service.

The Industrial Park was selected as the location for the center because the land was relatively inexpensive and the location was excellent for parents.

The idea was taken to Jim Rothschild, economic development director for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, for his reaction. Rothschild believed the idea was a unique concept that was worth developing, Otto said.

PERSONNEL DIRECTORS of the major industries in the Industrial Park also believed the center would be beneficial. They found the number of children with parents working in the Industrial Park was very high.

"It looked like there was a real need and that we could be of service to the industries out there," Otto said.

Once the Industrial Park land was secured, the next step called for rezoning the area for the day-care center. Otto said a delay in rezoning, coupled with bad weather, set construction back about a month.

"We're hoping to get through five straight days of warm weather," he said.

The construction is now almost complete and the partners are hoping to open the center by the middle or end of March, according to Otto.

The partners are also hiring staff members for the facility. Part of the staff will be transferred from another day-care facility already in operation.

OTTO SAID their primary objective is to provide the best day care program in the area.

"The location isn't the most important thing," he said. "The quality of care and actual training program is. We intend to have the very best quality and hope the location is an incentive to parents. We have no intention of running a sub-standard day care center."

The facility is expected to accomodate 48 children and employ a staff of six.

Otto said the monolithic dome was chosen because it is energy efficient. The structure will provide only a 10 percent heat loss or gain and is fairly inexpensive to build, he added.

"It's a great way to build a day-care center because it is important to keep kids at the right temperature," Otto said.

Building the day-care center has been a "great learning experience building from the ground up," he said. "It's been a real challenge this far, but it's been a lot of fun. We can't wait to get it open."

KENTON FISHER

HERE'S WHAT KENTON SAYS ABOUT HIS OPPONENTS:

SCOTT LONG—Scott preaches communication. Communication is good. But if you are strong on the issues, people will listen to you.

And about the President's Council. A Living Group Advisory Council was formed a few years ago, but was dropped due to the diffuculty of getting 52 representatives of the Greeks and halls there. He also would like the presidents of every campus organization there. Where will the meeting be held, CW101? And where do the off-campus students fit in? They deserve to be heard as well.

KELLY PRESTA—reallocate Senate representation—what a pipe dream! Student Senate has been predominantly made up of members of Greek houses, and there is no way they would pass a resolution like this.

It's not a bad idea, but why wasn't it brought up earlier? Kelly has been in Senate for two years—what has he done? If he's such a leader, why save all the best ideas for now?

JIM BOB MORRIS—what are his issues? An open door? What has he proposed? He tells everyone about his $300 of parking fees last year, but does this indicate responsibility?

BILL ROGENMOSER—no issues, no substance! If he is not willing to take up an issue as a candidate, what is he going to do as President?

WILLIAM CRAIG—no advance planning. He likewise has not offered any proposals to help students gain representation.

You Know Where Kenton Stands:

Increased Faculty Salaries. Without necessary increases in faculty salaries, the current exodus of instructors here at KSU will lead to catastrophic consequences. Quality pay for Quality Professors.

Withdrawal of KSU from Associated Students of Kansas (ASK). For too long, KSU has been footing the bill for this collective student lobby. What have we gotten in return?

KSU pays 40¢ for each full-time equivalent student. KSU could better use this money for issues concerning us.

A review of continued increases in Residence Hall fees, even though conditions have not improved. For the fifth year in a row, Residence Hall fees are going up. Where was our student government when this was being decided?

When residence hall fees go up, landlords often cite this as a reason to raise rents, which affects every off-campus student.

A review of the proposed 150-200% increase in parking fees. Why is it needed? What is it to be used for?

He's Concerned. He cares.

Titans to be removed; Kansas last on agenda

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Air Force's fleet of Titan II missiles, the last of the nation's early-generation liquid-fueled nuclear missile arsenal, will be taken out of service beginning this fall in Arizona, the Pentagon said Tuesday.

Dismantling of the 18 missiles ringing Davis Monthan Air Force Base near Tucson probably will start around October, according to congressional sources, as part of the strategic modernization program President Reagan announced last September.

The Pentagon announcement said the timing of deactivation of the other two sites — McConnell Air Force Base near Wichita and Little Rock Air Force Base, Ark., — "has not as yet been determined and will be announced at a later date."

But Sen. Bob Dole (R-Kan.) said later that missiles would be removed next at Little Rock, about 18 months after decommissioning starts in Arizona, and last at McConnell.

"The fact that Kansas is last on the retirement schedule gives military officials in Washington the necessary time to find other missions for the McConnell facility," Dole said.

The strategic plan announced last year said the 52 aging, leaky, liquid-fuel missiles would be retired because they pose safety threats to the public in the area of the silos and becaue they were becoming too expensive to maintain. The Titan system has been plagued by accidents involving spills of its volatile, toxic propellant, including fatal accidents near Damascus, Ark., and near Rock, Kan.

At first there were thoughts of replacing the missiles with the new-generation MX, a solid-fueled multiple-warhead missile. But the Pentagon recently said it prefers to site the first 40 or 50 MX missiles in more modern Minuteman silos located farther north.

The missiles are to be removed at the rate of about one per month. The Pentagon has said the Titans' large, single nuclear warheads — often referred to as "city-busters" because of their size and lack of pinpoint accuracy -- would be turned over to the Energy Department for disposal.

"There are no plans for putting anything else in the silos, but they aren't sure what they're going to do with them," said a staff source in the office of Sen. Dennis DeConcini (D-Ariz.)

Options for the vacated silos included dismantling or mothballing them. The threat to reactivate the silos could be used as a bargaining chip in strategic arms negotiations with the Soviets, the source said.

The 18-year-old Titans once were the centerpiece of the nation's strategic defense force, but they have been superseded by the more modern solid-fuel, multiple warhead Minuteman, of which the Air Force has 1,000 deployed in underground silos.

Musical brothers shine in Nooner spotlight

Mark and Monte Selby performed an hour of acoustical music for an appreciative crowd during Tuesday's Nooner. They opened with Jim Croce's "Speedball," then changed the pace with an old Kenny Loggins song, "House at Pooh Corner."

The two were playing together for the first time on stage, Mark said. Years of casual picking at home showed in their relaxed stage manner.

The brothers grew up in Oklahoma before "defecting" to Kansas, as Mark said in his introduction to a song he wrote, "Oklahoma Home."

Mark, six years older than Monte, is a professional whose music has taken him from the coffeehouses of New York to the clubs of Nashville as part of a country act, he said.

He has also competed in the fingerpicking championship at the Walnut Valley National Flatpicking Championship in Winfield, Mark said.

Mark started playing the guitar in high school and graduated from Fort Hays State University with a degree in music theory, he said.

Playing music professionally is "...a real inconsistent way to make a living," Mark said.

"The farther you get into playing music the more you realize you have to be a businessman...which is rather disconcerting," he said.

The Nooner was highlighted by Mark's guitar picking on Doc Watson's "Doc's Guitar," and Monte's easy vocals on songs such as James Taylor's "Fire and Rain," and a version of Stephen Foster's "Oh Susannah."

The two brothers are considering a tour this summer, Mark said. Monte, sophomore in music and math education, plans to teach after graduating from K-State, but hopes to continue performing.

House bill may allow custody from 'cults'

TOPEKA (AP) — A proposal to allow parents to remove their children from religious "cult" groups for mental evaluations and possible deprogramming won endorsement Tuesday from a House committee.

The proposal would give parents or guardians the right to take their children from a religious group for at least 45 days. During that time, a hearing would be held to determine whether the child was capable of making decisions or needed psychological treatment or deprogramming.

The measure won approval from the House Judiciary Committee on a voice vote after little debate.

Rep. Joe Hoagland, (R-Overland Park) and committee chairman, said the swift passage of the bill surprised him.

"It just cleared its first hurdle and it has a long way to go," Hoagland said. "Yes, I'm surprised it got through with so little debate. It passed the committee in five minutes."

The measure is aimed at Kansas residents thought to be victims of mind control by religious cult groups. The bill would free psychiatrists and psychologists to counsel or deprogram people determined to be unable to make "independent and informed decisions," or understand and control their own behavior.

Under the bill if a child returned to the religious group, the parents could not be sued by the group for "kidnapping." Enactment of the bill would make Kansas the first state in the nation to allow parents to retrieve their children for deprogramming.

Under the proposal, the guardian could be a family member, a spouse or physician.

Similar bills have been passed twice by the New York Legislature but vetoed by Gov. Hugh Carey. Opponents have argued that the measure discriminates against people who have undergone religious conversion and cover not only cults but also people who consider themselves "born-again Christians."

'Grandma' discovers skill, uses art to beat depression

By SHERRY SCHMITT
Collegian Reporter

Many people may never discover their hidden talents. At the age of 69, Elizabeth Layton discovered her ability to draw. It is now bringing her fame throughout the United States.

"Grandma" Layton, as she signs her works, uses the technique of blind contour drawing. She looks at the paper only for points of reference, concentrating on the subject itself rather than the line being drawn. For this reason, her works have distorted images, said Don Lambert, executive director of the Topeka Arts Council.

Her colored contour drawings are on exhibit in the Union Art Gallery until Feb. 19.

"Works by Grandma Layton are shocking, haunting, charming and humorous," he said. "She says something about art, creativity, growing old, staying young and being human."

LAYTON WAS born in Wellsville in 1909, the daughter of the town's newspaper owners. She had five children and at age 30 was divorced from her alcoholic husband and in charge of her parents' newspaper, Lambert said.

Layton went through therapy programs and electric shock treatments for a depression that came and went for nearly 40 years.

At the suggestion of her sister, who paints mountain scenes, Layton enrolled in an art class in 1977, Lambert said.

She started drawing in her bedroom after she came up with the technique of looking in a mirror and drawing herself. Soon after her first self-portrait, Layton was drawing 16 to 18 hours a day.

Lambert, a newspaper reporter who saw her drawings at a student display at Ottawa University, wrote a story about Layton and arranged for her works to be shown at the Ottawa Library.

"The reaction to her drawings at the Ottawa Library was typical," he said. "People laughed, the staff didn't like them. But a month later, when it was time to take them down, the staff begged to keep them."

Then the unexpected happened. One of her drawings won first prize out of 600 entries in a four-state annual competition at the Nelson Art Gallery in Kansas City.

HER FIRST-PLACE drawing, entitled "Skipping Down Christo's Walkway," depicts her skipping down the yellow-orange fabric in Kansas City's Loose Park. The fabric around her looks like a cocoon and she appears to emerge from it, ready to join the butterflies around her, Lambert said.

Layton was chosen one of three 1980 Kansas Governor's artists in 1980. In the spring of 1981, at the Nelson Art Gallery contest she had won the year before, one of her drawings was chosen among the top 10 out of 900 entries, Lambert said.

At age 72, Layton has become a full person, Lambert said. This is exemplified in one of her works in which she has her running shoes thrown over her shoulder.

When something bothers Layton, she draws it to get it out of her system. The Iranian hostage crisis, the People's Temple in Guayana and her son's death are depicted in her works.

Layton now uses a hand mirror when drawing herself, a "modified" contour technique. She says she peeks sometimes, but she never erases a line. This is her Golden Rule for life, Lambert said. When she makes a wrong line, she finds some way to incorporate it into her work.

Layton does not sell any of her works, although she does give them away on occasion, Lambert said. They are like children to her, he added.

Heart disease and stroke will cause half of all deaths this year.

AT&T antitrust settlement could double phone rates

TOPEKA (AP) — Saying the matter is nearly out of the states' hands, Kansas Corporation Commission Chairman Richard "Pete" Loux warned legislators today that local telephone rates will double or more than triple in the two years.

The increases, Loux explained, will be a product of a recent antitrust settlement against American Telephone and Telegraph Co. and general deregulation of the telephone industry.

In an appearance before the House Energy and Natural Resources Committee, Loux urged state lawmakers to pass a resolution urging Kansas' congressional delegation to enact legislation easing the impact of the AT&T settlement on all customers.

"It is important to point out that the ultimate resolution of these issues is not within the hands of the Kansas Corporation Commission, or any state commission," Loux said.

"These issues will be decided by the United States Congress, the Federal Communications Commission, the U.S. Justice Department and AT&T."

He emphasized that the antitrust settlement will greatly affect local residential telephone rates in the next two years, and he cited examples of Kansas communities where projections indicate rates will at least double and sometimes more than triple — excluding any long distance charges.

"The group of ratepayers most endangered by the proposed changes is the residential class," said Loux, who is the head of the state agency which regulates utilities in Kansas.

Rural people, Loux added, probably will be hit hardest by deregulation as their local rates and even long distance costs will be higher than for city dwellers because there is less usage to cover a company's investment in equipment and lines.

Under the antitrust settlement, announced Jan. 8, AT&T will be dismantled and each of the 22 Bell Operating Companies will be required to operate independently. That means deregulation of suppliers of telephone equipment for a customer's premise; a change in the way cost-of-service is distributed between local and long distance operations; a shift of jurisdiction over intrastate long distance from state regulators to the FCC; and revenues from Yellow Pages advertising would no longer help cover local operations.

The settlement, Loux explained, will affect all telephone companies operating in Kansas. Local rates likely will jump from 126 percent to more than 200 percent — going from a current $5 a month to more than $20 a month for the same residential customer.

Loux said federal legislation is pending which could offset some of the antitrust settlement's effects, and he suggested the Legislature become involved to ensure that Kansans are protected.

Alexandre Dumas
Author and Playwright

Alexandre Dumas was born at Villers Cotterets. Dumas was a Mulatto whose father was Haitian-born and whose mother was a black woman from Haita. He grew up in poverty and was educated by a local priest.

In 1827, Dumas went to Paris, where he began writing vaudeville sketches and plays. The Duke of Orleans became his patron, and Dumas became a productive playwright.

Dumas wrote historical novels that revised French history. In 1844, he wrote the world-famous Three Musketeers in eight volumes.

The twelve-volumes of Count of Monte Cristo were completed in 1844 and La Reine Margot in 1945.

Dumas wrote a daily newspaper, La Mousquetaire, and also constructed his own theater for the performance of his plays.

Dumas had one son, Alexandre "Dumas fils," who was also a distinguished author in his own right.

The student body presidential race begins anew today. This time, there will be two candidates: Scott Long, junior in journalism and mass communications and Bill Rogenmoser, junior in secondary science education.

There will be a run-off election between Long and Rogenmoser Wednesday, since no candidate had a majority of the votes cast. Long received 874 votes (29.4 percent), Rogenmoser — 594 (20 percent); Kelly Presta, junior in political science — 473 (15.9 percent); Jim Bob Morris, senior in management — 271 (9.1 percent); Kenton Fisher, junior in accounting — 251 (8.4 percent); Dick and Steve (write-in) — 191 (6.4 percent), William Craig, junior in computer science — 174 (5.8 percent) and David Flippen (write-in) — 15 (.5 percent).

"I made the run-off!" Rogenmoser yelled to his supporters as he raised the telephone over his head after receiving news of the run-off from an elections committee member.

"I'm just going to keep on working hard and keep on a positive track," Rogenmoser said when asked about the coming week.

Student Body President —
Scott Long	874
Bill Rogenmoser	594
Kelly Presta	473
Jim Bob Morris	271
Kenton Fisher	251
Dick and Steve (write-in)	191
William Craig	174
David Flippin (write-in)	15

ROGENMOSER'S CAMPAIGN MANAGER asked what the elections committee member had said to him. Rogenmoser replied, "She said Scott Long and I were in a run-off and then I cried."

Rogenmoser's supporters kept repeating: "We're going to talk to everybody, we're going to talk to everybody."

At the Acacia house, Long was greeted with screams and hugs as he emerged from the phone booth with the election results. Minutes before, the house was filled with silence as his supporters waited breathlessly for the announcement.

Polish regime convicts four

WARSAW, Poland (AP) — The martial law regime sentenced four coal miners to jail terms Wednesday for organizing a strike in which nine people were killed in clashes with riot police.

Authorities also convicted a Solidarity leader at a trial that sparked singing of the national anthem in a Warsaw court, and prepared to try Solidarity's No. 2 leader in Gdansk.

The official PAP news agency said Solidarity member Stanislaw Platek received a four-year sentence and three years' loss of civil rights from a Silesian military court in southwestern Katowice for the Dec. 13-16 strike at the Wujek mine.

Officials say 10 people have been killed since imposition of martial law Dec. 13. One was killed in a demonstration in the Baltic port of Gdansk, and nine more died when riot police stormed the Wujek mine and opened fire to quell resistance.

PAP SAID Jerzy Wartak got 3× years in jail and three years' loss of rights for the Wujek strike, while Adam Skwira and Marian Gluch received three years in jail and two years' loss of rights.

Off-campus students elect 7 representatives

Off-campus students elected seven council members Wednesday.

The council represents approximately 60 percent of the students, said Gene Russell, OCSA president and junior in industrial engineering.

These students will meet within the next two weeks and elect a president, vice president, secretary and treasurer, Russell said.

The remaining officers will be council members-at-large and help coordinate association activities, he added.

The current officers will remain active for about one month and assist the new officers in becoming better acquainted with their responsibilities, Russell said.

"I think the way the group is moving now and OCSA plans for the future, will keep these people working hard in their upcoming term," Russell said.

Elections for OCSA are held annually and are open to all off-campus students.

There was little or no money spent on campaigning. People were told who was running and were invited to vote, Russell said.

An election committee, designated by OCSA, set up the election and tabulated the ballots.

The election results will be published in an advertisement in the Collegian when they are known.

Russell stressed the value of extracurricular activities such as OCSA.

"Being involved in some type of student organization is just as important as attending classes," Russell said.

"Because 60 percent of the students are off-campus, OCSA president may be as important as student body president, 20 to 30 years down the road. It depends on how hard the group works, if they recognize themselves and how they unify," he said.

Students petition for safer lighting

By DAWN SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Concern for night safety has prompted the Home Economics Council (HEC) to circulate a petition requesting better lighting on campus.

Until the end of last semester the petition had been circulated only among the living groups of the HEC members, some faculty and their classes.

A cover letter will be sent this semester to President Duane Acker; the 1982-83 student body president; Gene Cross, vice president for University Facilities; and John J. Conard, executive director of the Board of Regents.

"We feel that our college does not take a strong enough stand on University issues," Trina Cole, president of HEC, said.

HEC's original plan was to gain publicity by purchasing a lightpole and dedicating it.

"We decided that it wasn't our responsibility to come up with the money for a lightpost. We think the money is available for lighting," Cole said. "But instead of using it for lighting, it is being used to put flower beds in front of the Union, and for fancy sidewalks around the General Classroom building (Bluemont Hall)....Priorities need to get set straight for spending it. That is how we came up with the idea for the petition.

"We were hoping that it (the petition) would have a lot of impact on the campus and draw people's attention to the lighting problem we have," she said.

IN A REPORT compiled by Captain Gary Gillaspie of Security and Traffic, during 1981 one attempted rape and 17 aggravated assaults were reported on campus. Cole said she believes there is a correlation between where crimes were committed and poorly-lighted areas.

Cross said, "We (the University) don't publicize or advertise our problems, but we will answer specific questions if people want to know — it is public information."

Esther Hagen, student senator and senior in home economics, took issue with Cole's statement that more lighting would reduce crime on campus.

"I don't know that more lighting is the answer," Hagen said. "Most of the areas that are poorly-lighted are wooded, especially around Justin Hall. People shouldn't walk through those areas if they are concerned about their safety in the first place."

Cross said he was unaware of the petition. According to Security and Traffic and Lafene records, "there has not been any increased illegal activity that would warrant increased lighting," Cross said.

"If these rumors circulating have actually happened, then the University wants to know about it," he said.

State Penitentiary fire causes heavy damage

LANSING — Fire heavily damaged a maintenance building and the chapel at the Kansas State Penitentiary, but no injuries were reported, authorities said.

The fire, which burned out of control for 2½ hours, apparently started in the Engineering Maintenance building, Gordon Hetzel, deputy director, said. Flames spread to the chapel, located behind the maintenance building, he added.

The "pretty good-sized fire" sent clouds of black smoke and flames shooting into the air, Linda Moppin, a prison spokeswoman, said.

Inmates were locked in their cells after the fire was discovered shortly before prisoners were to be given their noon meal, Moppin said. All inmates were accounted for in an emergency head count, she added.

Firefighters from Lansing and Delaware Townships sent four trucks inside the prison walls to battle the fire, Hetzel said.

The blaze was brought under control at 2:30 p.m., and inmates were released for an evening meal about two hours later.

Hetzel said the state fire marshal and prison security officers had started an investigation to determine the cause of the fire. No damage estimate had been established.

Representative urges basing B-1 in Missouri

WASHINGTON — Rep. Ike Skelton Wednesday urged Air Force Chief of Staff Lew Allen to consider basing the proposed B-1 bomber at Whiteman Air Force Base in Missouri.

Skelton conveyed the request in a meeting with Allen at which the Missouri Democrat emphasized that the base, near Knob Noster, Mo., is underutilized and has an ideal central-United States location.

The Pentagon plans to ask Congress for 100 B-1 bombers during the 1980s to reinforce its aging B-52 fleet. The first B-1s are scheduled for delivery in 1986, and the Air Force is deliberating on possible sites for the new aircraft.

Among possible sites is McConnell Air Force Base near Wichita, which now is home to the nation's largest air National Guard unit.

Whiteman is control center for a group of Minuteman missiles, but has not been host to a flying unit since a fleet of B-47 bombers was based there, Skelton said.

Former NBA star finds wife dead in car

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The wife of Lucius Allen, a former National Basketball Association star, was found dead Tuesday in the basement garage of the couple's suburban Lee's Summit home.

Police said Wednesday that Allen discovered the body of his wife, Melanie Rose, 34, in the back seat of their Mercedes. One investigator theorized she died of carbon monoxide poisoning and said there were no signs of violence.

The medical examiner's office was investigating.

"We'll leave it in limbo until we hear from Dr. (Bonita) Peterson," the medical examiner, said Jim Oakley, a police spokesman.

Oakley said Mrs. Allen's body was found in the car parked in a closed garage. He aid the car's ignition switch was on but the engine was not running and the fuel gauge registered empty. He said Allen found the body as he carried some items to the basement.

Allen, who is from Kansas City, Kan., played basketball at UCLA in the late 1960s and later on professional teams in Milwaukee, Los Angeles and Kansas City. He retired from the Kansas City Kings at the end of the 1978-79 season.

State constitution forbids gift of puppy paper

SPOKANE, Wash. — Shredded paper lining the puppy cages at the Spokane Humane Society is being provided illegally, said a community college administrator.

The state constitution prohibits Spokane Community College from giving shredded trash to the pound, said Don Kolb, administrative services manager for Community College District 17.

Secretaries at the college have donated shredded records and trash to the pound for 10 years, "but the law is very strict on this kind of thing," Kolb said.

While the constitution makes no mention of puppies frolicking in shredded state paper, it does prohibit "a state agency from giving money or property to any private person or entity," said Robert Hauth, senior assistant Washington attorney general.

"And if the college is giving something away that somebody else would pay for, it's a question that someone might look at," Hauth said.

Cox uses the paper to line puppy cages. "It keeps the puppies cleaner. We just have to have it," he said.

Kolb says that's precisely the point. If the pound needs shredded paper, then so do gift and pet shops. "If we are going to allow this sort of thing, it should be put out on a bid basis."

Chemical arsenal defeats objective

President Reagan has given the Pentagon a green light to resume production, after a 13 year moratorium, of chemical weapons. The reason: chemical weapons are "essential to the national interest," as reported by the Wall Street Journal.

The only stopping block to this reported $30 million defense expenditure is a Congressional effort to delete the funds from the continually expanding military budget.

The Pentagon is backing the production of chemical weapons as a measure to persuade the Soviets to agree to "a complete and verifiable ban on the development, production and stockpiling of chemical weapons." The arms race has escalated to its present terrifying level because of this continued line of Pentagon and Kremlin philosophy. This form of military buildup has only succeeded in creating a paranoia and reciprocating measures by the "other side."

The mistrust between the current two world powers will continue and grow if chemical weapons are re-introduced to the factory. The military experts are declaring, as reported by the Wall Street Journal, that the current stockpile of chemical weapons is adequate and that the Pentagon is crying wolf over the Russian chemical weapon advantage.

At the current European Conference on Security and Cooperation in Spain, Secretary of State Haig addressed the Polish implementation of martial law as a clear violation of the Helsinki Act. The Soviets countered Haig's speech with the notion that U.S. military support of El Salvador and plans to resume production of chemical weapons were blatant evidence of aggression by the United States.

Reagan and the Pentagon are feeding the flames that turn the U.S.S.R. away from believing that the United States, along with its population, really wish to place a yellow light on the arms race.

No studying allowed

Editor,

Last Friday I made arrangements with a friend to spend the evening studying. We arrived at the library around 9:10 p.m., walked in the open doors, spread out our things, and no sooner had we sat down, when the janitors informed us that the library closed at 6:00 p.m. on Fridays (9:00 p.m. for the basement).

So, we packed up and trekked on over to the Union and settled in the Catskeller. At 9:30 p.m. Union management entered and announced, to the approximately 15 students present, that the Catskeller would be closing. It was reserved for a party.

They suggested that we move our things out by the vending machines. This time we were able to study successfully for about 45 minutes. Then it hit us, boom-click click! Boom-click click! Disco music reverberated through our bodies. I looked up to notice that my friend was bouncing in her chair. We both laughed. Though the hopelessness of the situation amused us, we were unsuccessful in accomplishing what we had set out to do.

I am very sorry that in a supposedly "educational environment" we found so little support. It is my understanding that this situation is unique to K-State and I would like to see it changed.

A special kind of love

Everyone told me not to do it. They told me I was crazy to leave for Salina at 9:30 p.m. in the middle of a snowstorm. Actually I wasn't thrilled with the idea myself, especially with my unpredictable car, but I had to be there.

What, you may ask, would compel me to do such a thing?

If you guessed stupidity, you are wrong. I was drawn to Salina for some special reasons — 1,400 special reasons.

For the past three years I have been drawn to the Kansas Special Olympics Winter Games on the first weekend in February. At these games, I have not only learned about the hundreds of Olympians with mental and physical handicaps, but I have learned a lot about myself.

As a volunteer at the Winter Olympics, I have worked exclusively with the bowlers. I figured that, having been on K-State's Women's Bowling team, I could be of the most service in that area. I can't say that I helped the bowlers bowl better but I did let them know that someone was rooting for them.

MY FIRST learning experience with the Olympians came when I was "helping" a little girl to bowl. She was about nine years old and was not doing well. Every time she let loose of the ball it would roll about five feet and glide into the gutter. I felt so bad for her.

Having been on the bowling team, I figured that I could help. I took her arm and we swung the ball together.

"OK, let go on the count of three," I said. "One (we swung the ball), two (again we swung), three (we swung and let go)."

The ball went two feet before rolling into the gutter.

I knelt down and put my arms around her, telling her how sorry I was. But, before I realized what was happening, SHE had her arms around ME and was telling me it was all right. It was then that I knew that rolling a strike was not the most important thing to her, competing was.

"Let me win, but if I cannot win, let me be brave in my attempt."

EACH YEAR, before the first ball is rolled out, Olympians, coaches and volunteers recite this prayer — a prayer for bravery, not success.

It's an incredible thing to see one of the "special kids," as they are called, bowl. The only moans and groans you would hear at the bowling alley are primarily those of volunteers who have never been to the Olympics before.

We have been socialized into thinking that rolling a gutter ball or scoring less than ten pins is failure. At Special Olympics, "failure" is an unknown word.

This past weekend I saw a young blind man bowl 140 and kids in wheelchairs break 100. The incredible thing is that they were no happier than the girl from Big Lakes Developmental Center in Manhattan who bowled a 40, or the girl from Concordia who barely broke 20.

BRAVERY is only part of the magic of Special Olympics. There is a mystical element that draws volunteers back every year. An alluring perfume that overpowers a person and makes all other obligations seem unimportant.

If such a substance did exist, the perfume would be called "Essence of Undemanding Love."

As Valentine's Day approaches, lovers are taking vows of undying devotion, but none without a price. They all want love in return.

Not since the days of the Yippies has there been as much free love as at the Special Olympics. Kids just reach out to everyone and anyone to give love.

I think that's why the weekend is so therapeutic for me. It's nice to love and be loved with no strings attached.

I, like all the other volunteers who come back year after year, am drawn to Special Olympians. At first I was scared, they were different from me, more open, and I was insecure behind my own barriers.

Special Olympics breaks down the barriers that our society shores up. It tramples the mandates that handicap us, telling us that we must be perfect to succeed, we must choose carefully the ones we love so we are not hurt, and we must be "normal" to be accepted. I understand now that their "handicap" that keeps them from growing mentally also keeps them from developing building those barriers.

After three years of working with Special Olympics, I have to wonder whether the Olympians are the ones who are truly normal and we, who are mentally and physically "normal," are the ones with the true handicaps.

Old reggae songs hold quality in new release

By KENT HERMES
Collegian Reviewer

Collectors of Bob Marley and The Wailers records have another album to pick up. "Chances Are" is a varied range of previously unreleased studio material recorded from 1968 to 1972.

Most reggae recordings of that time period were still being done on inferior two-, three- and four-track machines, but all the tracks on this one are well-preserved. The obviously older tracks sound much better than most of the other Marley recordings that have surfaced since his death.

Most of the songs recorded after 1970 are on side one. "Reggae On Broadway" is an unusually optimistic number dominated by a hard-edged rock-guitar approach not present in Marley's later work. The title track, an older R&B-flavored song is an excellent example of the fusion happening with Jamaican and American music in the late '60s. "Gonna Get You" and the rock-steady number "Soul Rebel" clearly capture the spark and magic of the original Wailers' sounds.

Side two starts off with the light-hearted "Dance Do the Reggae," another atypical Marley composition. This and "Mellow Mood" bring to light the spirit of revoluton that the Wailers' music represented. Like most of the other cuts, "Stay With Me" features a classic Wailer vocal arrangement. The closing track "(I'm) Hurting Inside" catches a rare rock-steady reggae production of rich, thick horn arrangements and an up-tempo driving bass.

Undoubtedly some of the strongest and best music Marley recorded was with the original Wailers, including Peter Tosh and Bunny Livingston (now Bunny Wailer).

This collection of Bob Marley and The Wailers music basically covers the early peak period before Livingston and Tosh broke off to begin solo careers. The music of this period is still important to reggae artists today. Groups like Blue Riddim Band and Kid Creale and The Coconuts draw from the early roots of reggae.

It is too idealistic to expect all Marley collections that are sooner or later unearthed to be of this quality, but it's nice to know his early music is now available on such a cleanly-produced album.

Basketball ticket distribution plan may be changed

A new basketball ticket policy will be presented to Student Senate tonight.

The basketball ticket sales committee is to explain its proposed solution as to how tickets should be distributed, said Doug Dodds, senior in political science and senate chairman. The committee started on the proposed plan for ticket sales a year ago, he said.

The policy is designed to distribute tickets in a fair and orderly manner and to try to alleviate some of the hostility of fans who don't receive tickets, Dodds said.

John Gilliam, junior in agricultural education and sponsor of the bill, said the proposal calls for senate and the committee to oversee the running of the ticket line.

"We want to keep kids in class as much as we can," Gilliam said. He explained that under the proposal, one person will be able to stand in line for five during the week for roll call. On weekends and at night, roll call will be determined by the people running the line.

It is hoped that the new policy will shorten ticket lines and make them more organized, Dodds said.

Poland

At the Vatican, Polish-born Pope John Paul II told Polish pilgrims that human dignity "can never be taken away at any time, anywhere." The pontiff later continued talks on strategy toward the Polish regime with Poland's Roman Catholic prelate, Archbishop Jozef Glemp.

Secretary of State Alexander Haig told reporters at the European Security Conference in Madrid that "never before has there been such unanimity of view achieved within the NATO alliance" as there has been over the Polish crisis. The allies have repeatedly condemned the Polish crackdown.

IN WASHINGTON, President Reagan won the consent of Congress for his policy of making $71 million in interest payments on government-backed food loans to Poland without requiring that the Polish government be declared in default. Poland owes the West an estimated $26.5 billion.

Meanwhile, about 200 spectators at the trial of a Warsaw Solidarity organizer from the Ursus tractor factory burst into the national anthem during the reading of a guilty verdict, sources said.

The defendant received a three-year sentence for strike activities at the Warsaw Solidarity stronghold.

In Gdansk, the provincial prosecutor said Solidarity's No. 2 leader, Miroslaw Krupinski, is to be court-martialed for organizing a national strike committee after military rule was imposed Dec. 13.

The prosecutor, Bronislaw Medejski, answered questions Tuesday from foreign reporters allowed to visit Gdansk, Solidarity's birthplace, for the first time since martial law was imposed.

Many of the workers interviewed by the reporters said they were eager for the return of Solidarity, the first union free of Communist Party control in the Soviet bloc.

Board discusses plan for Courthouse plaza

By ANNE SCHMITZ
Manhattan Editor

In an effort to encourage movement on the Downtown Redevelopment project, members of the Downtown Redevelopment Advisory Board (DRAB) met Wednesday morning to discuss various alternatives for the County Courthouse plaza concept.

Although the absence of two board members prohibited the board from taking official action, the informal meeting served as a sounding board for varying proposals for the area.

The proposed plan involves converting the courthouse, courthouse annex, and the Wareham building into a plaza area by closing the 100 block of Fifth street. The plan would include housing both city and county governments in the plaza in order to create close cooperation between the two bodies of government, according to Bernd Foerster, DRAB chairman and dean of architecture and design.

THE PLAN is also expected to increase desirable pedestrian activity in the downtown area.

Courthouse officials first acknowledged the severe lack of space afforded government offices in 1979. A study was conducted, and in 1981 the Landmark architectural firm was granted the redevelopment contract.

Kent Foster, Landmark architect, said the firm's concept included housing three courtrooms in the courthouse, with administrative offices located in the Wareham building annex. He said the Riley County Health Department would be moved from its location in the Wareham Music Village Building to the third floor of the Wareham annex until renovation can be completed on the courthouse annex.

"We have taken a long time with this plan — we feel we must move ahead because we're so cramped," Commissioner Rosie Rieger, said. "It's a good, solid plan."

FOSTER SAID he thought grassy areas would create a "nice atmosphere for the county facilities," adding that facing the Wareham building with limestone would help tie the former hotel to the other limestone structures to be included in the plaza.

The subject of parking and traffic flow raised concern among a few board members.

Foster said the proposed plan would allow for 10-15 extra parking spaces in the courthouse parking lot.

Gary Stith, community developer, explained that the closing of Fifth street would not cause traffic problems because the one-way streets in the area (Humboldt and Fourth streets) would be changed to allow more access.

"The one-way street system really doesn't facilitate easy movement," Stith said. He said the downtown mall study included a recommendation for changing the streets to two-way lanes.

"No details have been worked out yet," Foster said. "It's just a proposal, but we haven't had too much objection so far."

Ken Boehr, president of the Manhattan Civic Theater (MCT), provided objection to the proposed use of the former Wareham ballroom for administrative offices.

Boehr said the Wareham building was of "prime interest" to MCT which sees the ballroom as exceptionally well-suited for the location of a civic theater.

THE THEATER has occupied several locations in past years including a section of the building now occupied by Houston Street Restaurant. The organization is currently utilizing City Hall facilities for performances.

"We are a very dynamic group, and we will survive," Boehr said. "But we have a deep need for a permanent facility. The plaza idea is a good idea, and a theater would not detract from the concept."

After surveying several potential locations, Boehr said the Wareham ballroom provided the only available site large enough for their purposes.

In opposition, Foster said the "large open spaces" of the ballroom area was required for administrative offices to function properly.

Foerster said he believes the location of the theater in the Wareham building would greatly increase desirable activities in the downtown area.

"The question is, is it possible to do all the things we're talking about?" Foerster said. "The only way we can solve this problem is to look at the total need — what is the most logical solution. At this point I would hope the door is not shut (to compromise)," he said.

The board plans to meet next week with a full quorum to further discuss and research the various courthouse options.

On the Third Anniversary of the Islamic Revolution of Iran

Today marks the third anniversary of the Islamic revolution of Iran. The last three years particularly have been a period of outstanding achievements and tremendous results for Islam, Moslem people, and in general the oppressed people of the world. Improvements in many different areas have been so great and history-making that not only have they resulted in the boycott of facts and reflection of the outcomes of the revolution by the enemies, but they have started the biggest propaganda campaign and flood of plots against this three year old revolution.

Enemies of the Islamic revolution are so scared of the spread of this revolt among oppressed people of the world, that so far they have used every possible way to demolish this cry for justice and humanity. By fabrications, rumors, misinformation, creating internal and external wars, terrors, sanctions, and many other varieties of troubles, the enemies of Islam are trying to give to the world a fabricated false image of this beloved revolution, one of a barbaric, inhumaniterian, unstable country. The "crime" of Iran is the act of cutting off the hands of those defenders of "humanity," "progress" and "modernization," and their lackies who for years barbarically killed, maimed, and tortured a nation, held it backward while plundering its resources, misused people while treating them like animals, and much more. The "crime" of Iran now is bringing criminals to justice and stopping them from further acts of violence and terror.

The rumors and lies which are being circulated these days all over the world about killings, tortures, and chaos in Iran do not surprise Iranians. After all, these lies and rumors come out of those same mouths, magazines, networks, etc. which were silent not only at the time of the previous regime's crimes, but still do not reflect the severely inhuman and barbaric acts of those who kill people from two and a half years old to 90 years old. Those who bomb public prayer meetings, terrorize servants of people, and many other crimes. But no matter how much and how hard they try, there is just no way that they can crush this revolution or stop it from spreading elsewhere. In fact, already there are signs of Islamic revolution in many other countries. So it is no wonder that enemies of the revolution, U.S. government included, are so lavishly and desperately trying to equip themselves against this unusual new movement. That in itself is infact a good indication for us that the revolution has not been diverted from its original path. Our best wishes and warmest regards for the Islamic revolution of Iran and its followers and supporters.

—Long live the Islamic revolution of Iran.
—Down with East and West Imperialism, international zionism and their lackies.

Police harbor forgotten 'lost' items

By DOUG WARD
Collegian Reporter

Tucked away behind an accumulation of gloves, keys and scarves, nestled among a pile of ownerless coats, leaning against an office wall in the Department of Security and Traffic is a record album entitled "Take Me."

"Claim Me" might have been a more appropriate title.

The album, gloves, coats and keys are just a sample of the items that have been turned in to the department as lost and found.

Some of the more valuable items, such as bicycles, are kept in secure storage. Other items are kept in locked offices for easier access, according to Art Stone, director of Security and Traffic.

LOST AND FOUND items must be kept a minimum of six months, Stone said, after which the property can be auctioned or given to community service organizations.

Security and Traffic conducts two "lost and found" auctions per year. Last year approximately $800 was collected from the sales, and that money was used to purchase things that "will benefit students in some way," Stone said.

Money from past auctions has been used to purchase bicycle racks around campus. Future auction funds will be used to buy things that are needed on campus, but for which no money has been allocated, Stone said.

One example of this, he said, might be emergency lights or telephones for areas that are presently without them.

Items that cannot be sold are given to the Red Cross, Institute for the Blind, or other organizations that do something for the community, Stone said.

ALL LOST AND found articles turned into the department are tagged with a property sheet which includes a description of the article, when and where it was found, according to Stone.

Before anything is released, the property sheet must be signed and a reason given for the article's release. These sheets are kept on file in the department, Stone said.

Security and Traffic will run a check on lost and found items that have a name or some other form of identification. That person will then be notified and the property returned, he said.

"With class rings, we have gone as far as calling the school to check with them about initials on the ring," Stone said. "We would just as soon get rid of the articles and get them back to their owners. We just don't have the storage area to keep them."

THE FIRST STEP in locating lost property is to contact the Department of Security and Traffic and describe the article lost, Stone explained.

With such a simple process of retrieving property, why are so many articles never claimed?

One problem is that there are several lost and found areas on campus, according to Stone. Besides the items held by Security and Traffic, there are lost and found departments in the Union and many of the colleges, he said.

People often lose an article but are not aware of exactly where they lost it, Stone said. People have a tendency to think they will never get the item back and therefore will not call Security and Traffic, he added.

Al Myers, evidence technician for Riley County Police Department (RCPD), said people need to engrave their property so it can be identified.

A driver's license number and a person's name are the best ways to label personal items, Myers said, because the number and name can be easily traced.

RCPD has an engraver that is available to use for making permanent identification on personal property, he said.

Lost and found items at RCPD are kept for six months, after which the property is either auctioned or destroyed, Myers said.

The first step in claiming an item from RCPD is the same as it is with Security and Traffic — call and identify the lost article.

Students may get bowl bid in varsity contest of minds

K-State may play in a bowl game next year without scoring a single touchdown. It's not a football bowl game, the contest is an academic battle of wits.

"It's a worldwide varsity sport of the mind," said Don Reid, creator of the "College Bowl."

"College Bowl" is a trivia game formerly aired on television, now aired on CBS radio, that pits two universities' student panels against each other. The competition is sponsored in the United States by the Association of College Unions.

"It is based on what you know, and what your recall is," Reid said.

Last year more than 140,000 games were played in the United States alone, Reid said.

"That's probably more games played in a year than any other sport," he added.

The Union Programming Council, responsible for funding the team, will decide if it wants to enter the competition, according to Mike Hatch, program director of the Union. If K-State enters the trivia contest, UPC will set up a campus tournament early in the fall.

If K-State were to go to the national finals, the "College Bowl" panelists would be competing for money that would go into a general scholarship fund.

A contest similar to the "College Bowl" may be set up this semester by the University Learning Network to gauge student interest, said Pete Manfredo, assistant director of ULN.

The cost of holding a contest is one factor which may prevent participation. Acquiring a lock-out system which indicates the first team responding to a question can be "fairly expensive," Hatch said. But, he added that arrangements could be made to borrow a system from another school.

"The questions are drawn from fields as diverse as contemporary culture and ancient history, literature, science, politics and sports," said Pam Haslam, director of Press Information for CBS Radio Network.

Reid complained that television networks place too much emphasis on athletic superstars.

The game is played by "average nice young people," Reid said.

"They are playing a fun game, and at the same time sharpening their skills...," Reid said. "It's time they (the networks) found a half hour to show what the rest of us are made of."

Reid compares the competition to a basketball game.

"It's a toss-up of the ball at center court," he said. "The team that answers the toss-up question gets a chance at an added bonus, like a free-throw — it's that kind of a competitive thing."

Senate vote honors urgent request for more funds supporting jobless

WASHINGTON (AP) — Responding to President Reagan's urgent request, the Senate unanimously gave final congressional approval Wednesday to an additional $2.3 billion in jobless pay and services made necessary by the recession.

The 95-0 Senate vote followed by one day a lopsided House vote and sent the measure to the White House for Reagan's signature.

There has been virtually no disagreement in Congress over the need for additional money to deal with the unexpectedly high joblessness caused by the recession.

Nevertheless, Republicans and Democrats have used the measure to argue about which party was to blame for the recession.

Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D-N.Y.) said it was ironic to be considering such a measure as legislators heard "talk of freezing this, chopping that, cutting away" the government's domestic spending programs.

Such talk is similar to the "pre-Depression mentality" of the 1920s, Moynihan said.

Unemployment was 8.5 percent of the work force last month, far above earlier estimates by administration and congressional economists. The Labor Department estimated that 9.2 million Americans were out of work in January.

Reagan's request to Congress called for $1.95 billion in new advances from the federal government to the states, whose own unemployment reserves have run low. It is the state governments that actually distribute unemployment benefits to the jobless.

The president's proposal includes another $210 million for employment service workers who attempt to help the out-of-work find jobs.

One size fits all...Rick Olson, junior in veterinary medicine, demonstrates the proper techniques of the farrier's art Tuesday night at the Horsemans' Association meeting in Weber arena.

Professor demonstrates craft of horseshoeing

By HEIDI BRIGHT
Collegian Reporter

For want of a nail, a shoe was lost. For want of a shoe, a horse was lost. This old saying still holds true, demonstrating the importance of farriers (horseshoers) in the horse industry today.

Rick Olson, junior in veterinary medicine and farrier, joined Dennis Sigler, professor of animal science, Tuesday night for a horseshoeing demonstration in Weber arena at a Horsemans' Association meeting.

Putting cold shoes on a chestnut mare and forging hot shoes from straight bar iron were highlights of the program.

"One of the most essential tools (for a farrier)...is an apron," Sigler said, as he and Olson donned heavy gray chap-like leathers, before they began shoeing.

The aprons protect the farrier's jeans and legs from nails that may be jerked wrong. Nails have been known to go through the apron and into a farrier's leg.

COLD SHOES are lighter, thinner and cheaper than hot shoes, and do not last as long. Most people use cold shoes, however, because "they're adequate for most circumstances," Sigler said.

An old shoe was pulled off a chestnut mare, and Olson put the mare's foreleg onto a metal stand and rasped down the hoof. Then he put the mare's hoof between his legs with the bottom up and pared down the sole. He checked the angle of the foot for balance, so the hoof would be perfectly flat on the ground when set down, and so the sloping pastern (ankle) bone would be at the same angle as the front of the hoof. Ideally this is a 45 degree angle, but Sigler said it normally runs 50 to 55 degrees.

To prevent paring away too much of the sole, Olson kept checking that sole. If too much is removed, the farrier will reach the sensitive tissue of the foot.

AFTER PARING down the sole, Olson took a factory-made cold shoe and began shaping it on his anvil.

"One of the secrets...is making as few a trips to the anvil as possible. He's in his mind thinking about the shape of that hoof (as he hammers)," Sigler said, describing what Olson was doing.

"Sometimes you get lucky and one of these factory-made shoes come out just right," he said.

Fixing the shoe to fit the hoof, instead of the hoof to fit the shoe "is an extremely important process," he said. They must fit perfectly, or they could be accidentally pulled off. The shoe should be one-sixteenth of an inch wider around the base of the hoof to allow room for growth, Sigler explained.

Stepping over to the gas forge after Olson had shoed the mare, Sigler began a hot shoe demonstration.

AS HE PICKED up a straight bar iron made of hot-rolled steel, Sigler explained how to cut the bar to the right length. The hoof is measured from the toe to the heel, that number is doubled, and one inch is added. "That usually comes out just about right," he said.

Sigler then thrust the center of the marked bar into the middle of the forge, and waited until it was red hot. With forge tongs he pulled it back out and beat it with the round head of a special hammer, sending loud resounding echos through the arena. First he formed a right angle with the bar, and then tapered the two sides, or branches of the shoe.

He pointed out that the metal should be kept flat while hammering, so the shoe would not bend too far out of shape. He made the branches narrower than the toe area, and tapered the heel.

All bending should be done with uniform red hot heat, Sigler said.

"There is no sweeter sound...than the sound of a good blacksmith hammer on an anvil," Sigler commented as he beat the metal into shape.

AFTER PUNCHING nail holes into the metal, with a large iron pencil-shaped tool called a pritchel, he cooled the shoe in a bucket of water and held it up for all to see.

"The secret of making handmade shoes is practice," he said. Some farriers in competition can make four handmade horseshoes from straight bar irons in 15 minutes, Sigler said.

Sigler learned to shoe mainly just on his own. "I had somebody kind of help me get started," he said, adding that he learned by watching and practicing.

Olson learned to shoe at the Kansas State Horseshoeing School in Girard. He has been shoeing horses for eight years, and started out because he wanted to shoe his own horse.

Both the farrier and the horse owner are responsible to each other for getting the job done right, Sigler said.

Owners should insist that the farrier explain what he is doing as he works.

"I think you owe that to yourself and to your horse," Sigler said. The owner should demand the best from the farrier, he added.

SHOEING ON a regular schedule of a new set of shoes every five to six weeks was also suggested by Sigler.

"Don't wait until the night before the show. Don't expect him to do miracles the night before a show...They can't perform miracles," Sigler said.

Sigler suggested shoeing the horse a week before the owner plans to attend an event, to allow time for problems to show up.

A farrier's biggest "gripe" against horseowners is that the horses have not been trained to pick up their feet, and are undisciplined, Sigler said. A horse's feet should be picked up every day, he added.

"One of the things they (horse owners) do learn is that the $25 they do spend (on shoeing)...is worth the money," Sigler said.

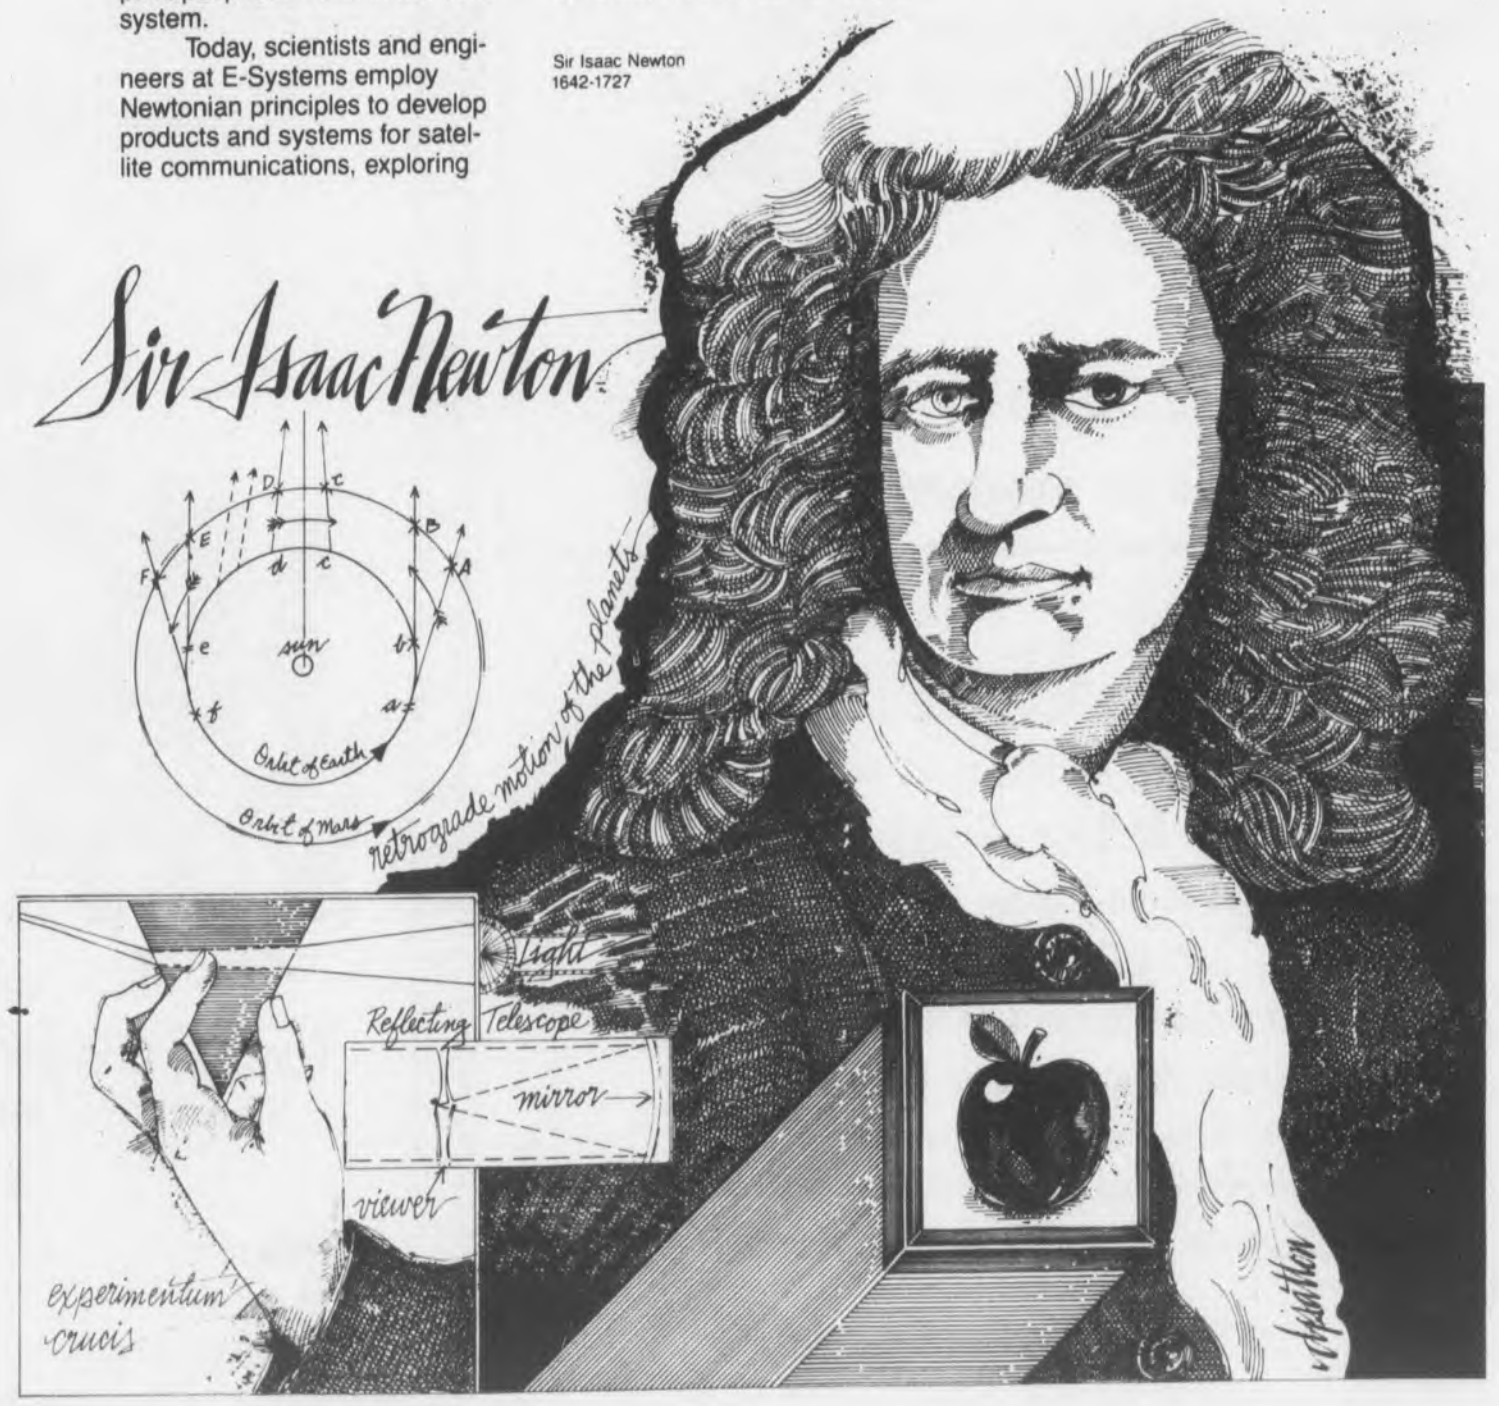
Even given the benefit of historical perspective, it is difficult to fully comprehend the enormous contributions to man's knowledge made by Sir Isaac Newton. His Philosopiae Naturalis Principia Mathematica is termed by many authorities to be one of the most important single works in the history of modern science. His studies of light are the foundation of physical optics and his laws of motion provided a quantitative description of all principal phenomena in our solar system.

Today, scientists and engineers at E-Systems employ Newtonian principles to develop products and systems for satellite communications, exploring space and the development of solar energy, systems which are the first-of-a-kind.



E-Systems engineers are recognized worldwide for their ability to solve problems in the areas of antennas, communications, data acquisition, processing, storage and retrieval systems and other systems applications for intelligence and reconnaissance.

Senate defeats change in post confirmations

TOPEKA (AP) — An attempt to keep the Kansas secretary of agriculture from being confirmed by the Kansas Senate was defeated in the upper house Wednesday.

Throughout its 111-year history, the state secretary of agriculture has been selected by the 12-member state Board of Agriculture, and no confirmation has been required.

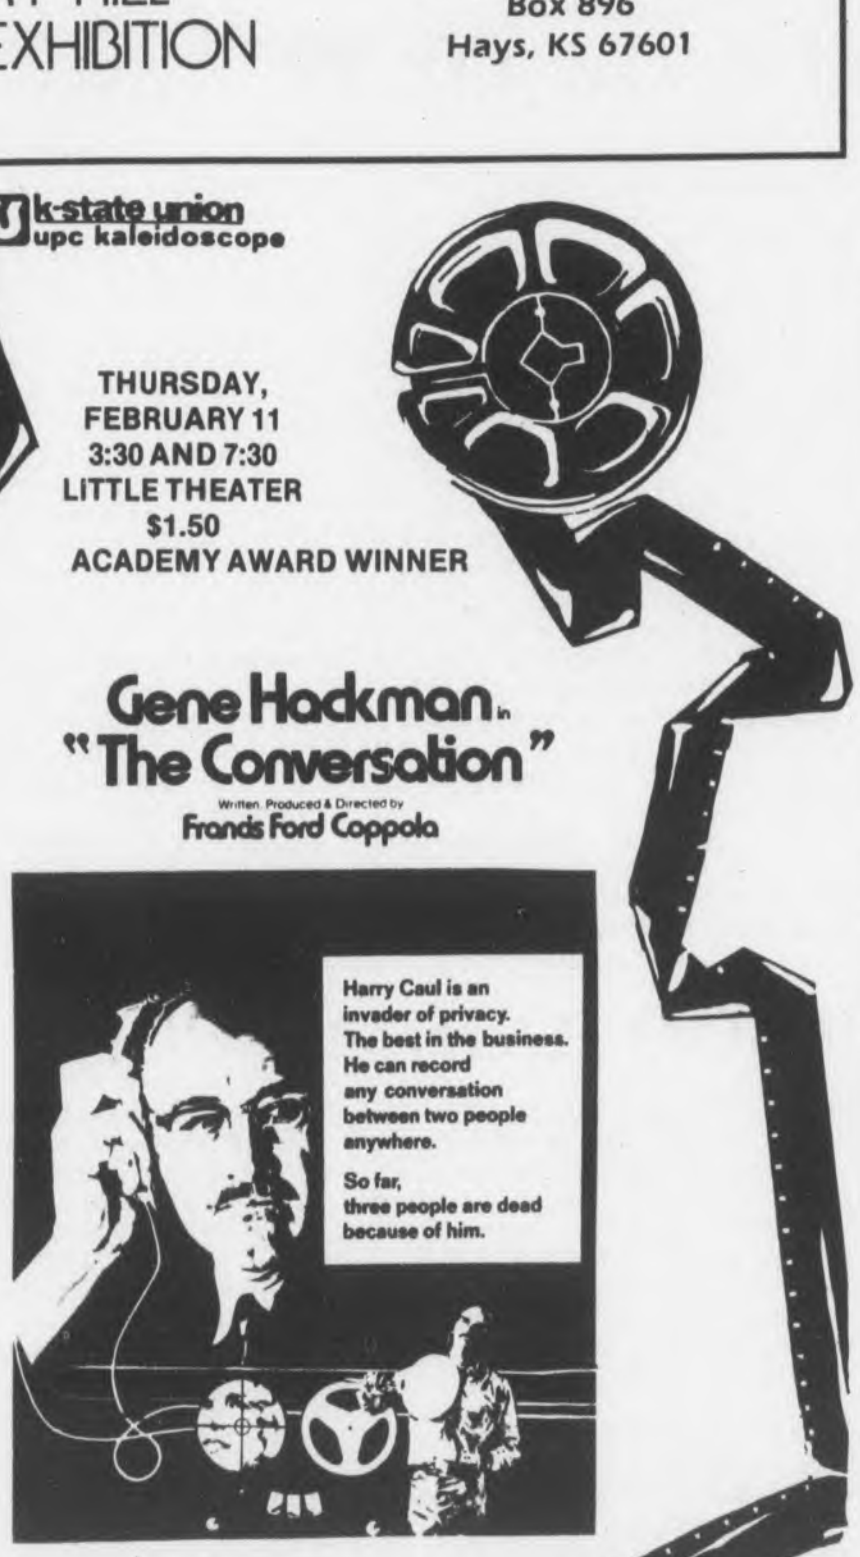
But under a major revision of the confirmation process, the agriculture secretary and several other posts would require confirmation for the frist time.

Sen. Fred Kerr, chairman of the Senate Agriculture and Livestock Committee, fought to keep the job from requiring Senate confirmation.

"The independence (of the secretary) has served us well in Kansas," he said.

Jack Steineger, Senate Democratic leader, said selection of the agriculture secretary was done only by farm organizations and they are dominated by a single farm organization, the Kansas Farm Bureau, which he named by inference.

By the same logic, labor organizations should be able to select the Secretary of Human Resources.



However, the state agriculture secretary will continue to be appointed by the agricultural board.

Little guns, Barnett runs, OU stuns

The Oklahoma Sooners had a case of happy feet and hot fingers at home Wednesday night.

On-the-mark shooting by David Little opened the door for Chuck Barnett's speed game. As a result, K-State got lost in the shuffle 68-58.

Barnett proved why he's currently the Big Eight leading scorer. The 6-foot-4 junior gave his foes a little lesson in transition. With every shot that rimmed off for the 'Cats, Barnett would take off on a fly for the other end and never look back, except to catch a long range assist from another Sooner.

But fast break scoring wasn't the only strategy Oklahoma Head Coach Billy Tubbs had up his sleeve. Barnett netted most of his 20 points from the fast pace of the game, but equally as important to the Sooner attack was David Little.

A smooth aerial jump shot proved to be more in line for the 6-foot-7 junior. In the first half, Little found his range from 25 to 28 feet, and for the game, fired in 20 points.

The Wildcats were conscious of Little's shooting ability, and K-State Head Coach Jack Hartman implemented a man-to-man defense in order to stop him. But efforts failed, and the Sooners built an 16-point lead three times in the first half.

With 7:45 left in the first stanza, K-State's Randy Reed lost the ball to Little. Little then tipped an assist to Barnett, who went all the way for a slam dunk.

The 'Cats were held scoreless for nearly three minutes, giving the Sooners time to double their score, 32-16. Oklahoma held its lead at the buzzer, 38-22.

The 'Cats game out smoking in the second half, but the fuse fizzled quickly.

Freshman Lafayette Watkins entered the game midway in the second half and added some spark with with 10 points, but the Wildcats couldn't topple Oklahoma's first half lead.

"We didn't lose the game as much as Oklahoma just won it," Hartman said.

K-State shot 42 percent from the field and never shot a freethrow. Oklahoma was 27 of 54 from the field for 50 percent and 14 of 20 in the freethrow category for 70 percent. Reed and Tim Jankovich led the Wildcats in scoring, each with 12 points. Charles Jones also had 12 for the Sooners.

K-State dropped to 16-5 on the season, 6-3 in the Big Eight. Oklahoma is 13-7 overall, and 5-4 in the conference.

Next action for the Wildcats is this Saturday, as both the men's and women's teams travel to Iowa State.

In other action around the Big Eight, Jack Moore scored 25 points as Nebraska defeated Oklahoma State 75-63 in Lincoln. The Cornhuskers are now 5-4 in conference play, 13-8 overall. The Cowboys have an identical record.

Cool under pressure

Working hard to get a pass away during the second overtime, Charles Knight, junior in industrial engineering, looks to hit an open man. Knight's intramural team, "R.H. Crushers," won the game Wednesday at Washburn Recreation Complex by one point on a last second freethrow.

Dickey signs 12 new 'Cats

By HOWARD RICHMAN
Sports Writer

February is not usually one of the months associated with college football, but Wednesday afternoon made this February an exception.

Collegiate programs throughout the nation were busy signing high school athletes to national letters of intent, as was K-State. The Wildcats signed 12 players Wednesday, the first day schools were allowed to do so.

Head Coach Jim Dickey received commitments from nine Kansas-area players and three from outside the state. Dickey said he was pleased with the players signed by K-State.

"I feel like we've really gotten some good players with good credentials. Not only are we extremely happy with our new signees, but we also are pleased with our current squad number," Dickey said.

K-State has approximately 75 players now that are on scholarship.

The newest set of gridders for next season is:

— Carlos Adams, running back, 5-foot-8, 175. A native of Atascadero, Calif., Adams ran for 4,496 yards in prep career. Scored 23 touchdowns his senior season.

— Gerald Alphin, tight end, safety, 6-foot-3, 205. Caught 41 passes for 641 yards last year. The St. Louis, Mo. resident has 4.6 speed in the 40-yard dash.

— Adrian Barber, defensive back, 6-foot, 180. Attended Topeka High School where he made second-team all-city. Recruited by most Big Eight schools, Barber runs a 4.5 40.

— Terry Davis, running back, defensive back, 6-foot-3, 185. Davis missed most of the 1981 season because of injuries. When he's healthy, Davis runs the 40 in 4.6. Attended Sumner Academy in Kansas City, Kan.

— Jeffrey Hurd, lineman, 6-foot-3, 212. Played both offense and defense on the line at Lincoln Academy in Kansas City, Mo. Was a second-team all-metro performer.

— Todd Moody, running back, 6-foot-2, 190. Led Ashland High School to 1-A state championship his junior year. Rushed for 1,068 yards as a senior.

— John Nearhouse, guard, linebacker, 6-foot-2, 235. The Temple Terrace, Fla., product garnered all-state honors as an offensive lineman. Nearhouse was also recruited by Tennessee, Duke and Arizona State among others.

— Bret Panton, lineman, 6-foot-7, 245. Another Topeka High graduate, Panton became a highly recruited player after playing only one year of high school football.

— John Randolph, fullback, linebacker, 6-foot, 205. Randolph made honorable mention all-metro for Harmon in Kansas City, Kan. and has 4.7 speed in the 40.

— James Ricketts, running back, 6-foot-2, 190. Averaged 190 yard rushing per game for Derby High. Rushed for 3,300 total yards in a little more than two seasons. Has 4.5 speed.

— Charles Sander, lineman, 6-foot-2, 245. The Topeka West grad made all-city and honorable mention all-state last year. Sander also saw time on the defensive line.

— John Stonner, lineman, tight end, 6-foot-3, 195. Stonner caught 55 passes for 755 yards in two seasons for Shawnee Mission Northwest High School.

Dickey said he hoped to sign three additional players by this weekend. He also said any remaining scholarships would be saved for walk-on players who make the roster.

'Gatos Bravos' lose Hutchinson tournament

K-State's MEChA organization sent a representive team to participate in the 8th Annual Hutchinson Mexican-American basketball tournament last weekend.

While the team failed to place in the double-elimination tournament after losing two of three games, it managed to put on a respectable showing, Larry Ramos, campus president of MEChA, said.

After losing to the Wichita Mexican-Americans in the first round, 43-33, K-State's "Gatos Bravos" (Wildcats) rebounded to stun tough Garden City Merchants, 30-26, before losing to the eventual consolation champs, Wichita Padres, in a 36-34 squeaker.

Topeka Cousins Tavern capped the championship by pulling out a 71-70 overtime thriller over Kansas City Amigos.

THE WICHITA PADRES' consolation championship earned them a third-place finish. The Padres captured the 2nd Annual K-State Mexican-American basketball tournament last November.

The 30-game tournament, which was sponsored by Hutchinson Community College MEChA, brought praise from Ramos, who managed the K-State squad.

"The tournament was very well-organized," he said. "Their MEChA did the mechanics of the tournament, but individuals in the community helped everybody in finding good references and housing — it was a consolidated effort."

The tournament consisted of 17 teams from Wichita, Hutchinson, Garden City, Emporia, Wellington, Topeka, Kansas City, Newton, Granada, Colo. and Manhattan.

Students who participated from K-State were: Larry Ramos, senior in psychology; Randolf Castor, freshman in general; Nick Aleman, senior in industrial engineering; Howard Allen, senior in engineering technology; Joel Torczon, senior in journalism and mass communications; and Tom Hererra, junior in psychology.

ALLEN PACED K-State with 13 and 10 points respectively in the first two games while Ramos scored 12 in the third game.

Asked what the purpose of attending the tournament was, Ramos replied, "We wanted to serve as a support group for Hutchinson Community College MEChA, and also get the chance to play basketball in the Sports Arena."

Castor said he enjoyed the tournament and believes the team enjoyed it also.

"There were some teams that were exceptionally good, and there were some that just wanted to be a part of the action," Ramos said. "The teams that K-State played took the game seriously and offered us challenging competition."

Castor also had praise for the tournament and the Sports Arena.

"It was their eighth annual tournament, so they were organized as always," he said. "We played on probably the best basketball court in Kansas as far as Mexican tournaments go, so it is hard to refuse a chance to play in Hutchinson."

Ramos said the team plans to attend two more tournaments before the semester is over. One will be at Emporia (Feb. 13-14), and the other is at Wichita (March 12-14).

Tax opponents cite study

TOPEKA (AP) — Waving its findings like a red flag, Kansas oil and gas industry representatives unveiled an $80,000 study Thursday and said it concluded that imposition of a severance tax would hurt the state's economy.

Three large independent producer groups, which financed the study, trumpeted its findings as their main argument against enactment of a severance tax on mineral production.

In testimony before the House Assessment and Taxation Committee, the industry groups said worst case projections indicated that severance tax proposals now in the Legislature, if enacted, would cause a loss in economic benefits between $16 million and $138 million.

"All three proposals will have a negative economic impact," said Bruce Morgan, who directed the study by the Midwest Research Institute of Kansas City, Mo.

HOWEVER, MORGAN acknowledged that his projections did not consider any potential offsetting effects, particularly removal of the federal windfall profits tax on so-called stripper oil production which is scheduled to begin in 1983.

Morgan said MRI was not taking a position on the controversial tax proposal, but merely presenting information on the study commissioned by the oil and gas industry. The study involved an analysis of the economic impact of the tax proposal, and production information on the industry and its contribution to the state's economy.

Money which would be paid by oil and gas producers through a severance tax — varying from $76 million to $176 million depending upon which bill is used — normally stimulates economic growth through investments in drilling activity and creation of new jobs, said Morgan.

THAT GROWTH, both direct and indirect, would be from $16 million to $138 million less if the severance tax revenue is funneled into funding of public schools and highway maintenance, Morgan explained. As a result, the state's economy would suffer reduced growth and fewer new jobs would be created. And ultimately, he warned, some existing jobs might be eliminated because of the slowdown.

He and others who testified warned that some low production oil wells might be abandoned if a severance tax is enacted. However, Morgan's study did not provide any information on how many wells would be shut down or if drilling would be reduced.

"This industry in Kansas is very sensitive," Morgan said. "It is a declining industry requiring constant investment."

THE HOUSE committee, which has held hearings on the severance tax bills since Tuesday, devoted about three hours Thursday exclusively to opponents of the severance tax. More than 150 people packed the committee room, the most since the hearings began.

Richard Smith, president of the Kansas Independent Oil and Gas Association, noted that crude oil prices had dropped since last year when Gov. John Carlin first proposed a severance tax from $38 to $39 a barrel to $34 a barrel. However, he said production costs would continue to rise and that a severance tax would make some small wells unprofitable.

He and others repeatedly urged the committee not to burden the

ROTC figures show decline in enrollment

It appears Kansans would rather see fields of waving wheat than artillery fields.

Brigadier Gen. Chris Divich spoke about declining enrollment in Kansas Air Force Reserve Officer Training Corps (AFROTC) Thursday afternoon in the Directors Conference Room in the Union.

His appearance follows the presentation of a "letter of concern" two weeks ago to President Duane Acker because AFROTC enrollment is only one student above minimum Congressional requirements.

While enrollment at K-State is low, Divich is more concerned with the University of Kansas (KU), Wichita State University (WSU) and Washburn University (WU). WSU closed its AFROTC program five years ago.

The Washburn detachment is closing because it could not generate enough students to support the program, Divich said.

The unit may remain open until "as late as 1983," said Lt. Col. Tom Fryer, head of the Department of Aerospace Studies.

KU has the least number of ROTC students in the nation for a school its size, Divich said, and is earning a reputation as the "Berkeley of the Midwest."

The lack of interest in AFROTC in Kansas is contrary to a national trend after the 1960s toward stronger ROTC programs, Divich said. Exemplifying his point, he said that Kent State University in Ohio, a school which experienced a violent reaction to ROTC programs in the early '70s, now has a strong ROTC program without student resistance.

With the increasing need for scientific/engineering disciplines, the fact that Washburn's curriculum did not offer engineering technology put its AFROTC program at a disadvantage, according to Bronislaus Blaszkowski, assistant professor of aerospace studies. This could increase AFROTC enrollment at K-State because it narrows the number of schools offering the program and because K-State offers an engineering technology curriculum, Blaszkowski said.

Parolee admits to murders

PALATKA, Fla. (AP) — A 36-year-old Wyoming prison parolee who has led police to the bodies of three hitchhikers and reportedly claims he has killed at least 10 people was ordered held without bond Thursday in his first court appearance.

Robert Dale Henderson appeared in court on a warrant charging him with the Jan. 25 murder of Dr. Murray Ferderber, 79, a physician from Pittsburgh. Ferderber's wife found him shot in the back of the head in their isolated mobile home near the small community of Satsuma.

No charges were filed immediately in the deaths of the hitchhikers, who have not been identified.

Henderson has also been charged with murdering three of his in-laws in Ohio. He told police in Charlotte County over the weekend he has killed 10 or 11 people in five states in recent weeks.

ON THURSDAY, Putnam County Judge William Warren ordered Henderson held without bond and appointed Howard Pearl, a public defender, to represent him.

Pearl said he would ask for psychiatric tests for his client, who turned himself in to police in Punta Gorda, Fla., on Saturday.

On Wednesday, while he was en route from Punta Gorda in southwest Florida to Palatka in northeast Florida, Henderson told deputies he wanted to show them where he dumped the bodies of three hitchhikers he claimed to have shot, said Capt. Clifford Miller, chief of Putnam County detectives.

Miller said he led them to a field in Hernando County, 65 miles north of St. Petersburg, where the bodies of two young men and a woman were found.

Capt. Dorothy Pearson of the Hernando County sheriff's office said the three had been dead about a week.

Carlin declines to name running mate

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin said Thursday he is not leaning at the moment toward Tom Docking or anyone else to be his lieutenant governor running mate when he seeks re-election later this year.

He confirmed at his weekly news conference, as his aides had done earlier, that he has discussed the possibility with Docking but that no decisions have been made.

Carlin said he would not give serious study to who his running mate should be until after the present legislative session, which runs until mid-April.

"I certainly have talked with him, and talked with a lot of people across the state," Carlin said, referring to Docking, the 27-year-old son of former Democratic Gov. Robert Docking.

"I think whoever I pick will be picked because he or she is an asset. But I'm not going to assess here and now who would be a good running mate. I just haven't had time to give it that much consideration."

Shuttle completes simulated launch

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — A simulated launch of the space shuttle Columbia was successfully completed Thursday night after being aborted earlier in the day by problems with a faulty computer system.

Rocky Raab, a spokesman for Kennedy Space Center, said the 6 p.m. mock mission was error-free. It had been rescheduled because of a problem in the "shared peripheral area" of the launch processing system.

The system is used only for simulations and would not have affected the third launch, set for March 22, officials said. The special computer programs on board Columbia and at the launch control center are designed to mimic actual flight conditions.

Raab said a crew of backup astronauts, Don Williams and John Lounge, were in the crew compartment and had just passed the simulated T-minus zero or blastoff time when the computerized system failed earlier in the day.

Kissinger recovers from heart surgery

BOSTON — Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger was "alert," talking to doctors, and visiting his wife Thursday, one day after 4½ hours of open heart surgery to relieve three clogged arteries.

"We are all very pleased," said one of the surgeons, Dr. Mortimer Buckley Jr. "The major risk over."

Martin Bander, spokesman for Massachusetts General Hospital, said Kissinger was "fully awake, alert and resting comfortably. He started talking to doctors after a tube inserted into his throat was removed this morning."

The tube was hooked up to a respirator which controlled Kissinger's breathing during the triple bypass operation, he said.

The 58-year-old Nobel Peace Prize winner was officially listed in stable condition in the hospital's intensive care unit.

Mother goes on strike to gain rights

SAN RAMON, Calif. — "Notice! This Mother, Maid, Cook, Driver, Laundress, Gopher, Money-Changer is on Strike Until Further Notice."

With that sign posted on the front of her house, housewife Mary Ellen Shaver told her three children she was fed up with working conditions. It's a strike with no end in sight.

"Parents have some rights, too," Shaver declared. "This is their home, and they have to learn how to take care of it."

The strike began Monday, when 18-year-old Beth Shaver returned from school and saw the sign posted near her dirty laundry dumped on the front porch.

Shaver is not batting an eye at the sight of aging Chinese take-out food on one of her daughter's bedroom tables. Or the towels and hair dryer on the floor of the children's bathroom.

Husband John Shaver, who is not being struck, fully supports her. But some of the kids aren't happy.

"As of this moment, they're a little bit stunned," he said. "Especially when they turned on the TV and found their rooms shown on TV."

Court reverses decision in injury case

TOPEKA — The Kansas Court of Appeals Thursday reversed a Wyandotte County District Court jury's decision awarding a Bonner Springs woman $86,000 in damages because a pop bottle fell off a grocery store shelf, broke and cut her foot.

The court held that to recover a suit for negligence in Kansas, there has to be proof that someone was at fault and in this case no fault was proved.

Reversed was the jury's judgment in favor of Florence Lee Wasson, who was injured Nov. 9, 1975, in Brewer's Food Mart a self-service grocery in Bonner Springs.

Wasson sued the store and Pepsi-Cola General Bottlers Inc.

She testified that when she entered the aisle where the soda pop was kept she noticed nothing to alert her of potential danger. However, a bottle fell as she was pulling out an eight-pack of Diet Pepsi. A piece of glass struck her foot and cut it.

This afternoon is expected to be sunny with a high of 25 to 30. Winds will be southwesterly at 5 to 15 mph. The low tonight will be 5 to 10. Saturday's high will be in the mid-30s.

Misleading ads need regulation

The SGA election campaign regulations have added a competitive spirit to student elections and a chance to prove or disprove a candidate's ability to handle responsibilities. However, the regulations should move one step further by placing an additional rule governing advertisements appearing in the Collegian.

This year, and in years past, advertisements have appeared containing quotations expressing an individual's reasons for supporting a particular candidate for student body president. However, the quotations have been signed with both names and titles these individuals may hold or explanatory remarks giving this individual a recognizable, and presumably persuasive, appearance.

Included are titles of honorary societies, college councils, political organizations, agricultural clubs or sports associations. By including these titles, these individuals are giving a false impression to the reader.

If every individual active in one or more of these clubs or organizations supported the candidate supplying the advertisement, then the endorsement would be valid. But if not, these advertisements are grossly unfair to individuals involved in these groups who may support a different candidate or none at all.

These ads have been highly effective for past presidential candidates but it should be the words spoken, the explanatory endorsements, that sway the voter. Voting is an individual move by students and any indication that groups are being persuaded to vote in blocks betrays this right.

Future Collegian advertisements, particularly during the up-coming runoff election, should avoid this misleading form of endorsement advertisement. Let the words, not the misused titles, convince the voters of an individual's ability and enthusiasm. These are the only qualities which should entitle them to occupy the position of student body president.

ASK deserves support

Editor,

After reading the Collegian article on the student body president candidate's debate, I was not surprised to see the Associated Students of Kanasas (ASK) become an issue again. In the four years I have attended this university, K-State's membership in ASK has been constantly debated.

ASK spends so much time trying to justify its existence to "concerned" student politicians that it has little time to do the job it was created to do. That job is to lobby for the concerns of students at the Regent's institutions in Kansas, such as faculty salaries, graduate student fee waivers and reasonable tuitions.

I have heard ASK complimented by legislators, lobbyists and government officials. ASK has been recognized nationwide for its leadership in representing students. Yet, student government at K-State has failed to give solid support to this worthwhile organization and, in doing so, has caused uncertainty and doubt.

What I am saying can be summed up in one sentence to student officials, present and future — get off ASK's back, give them the support they deserve and let them perform the task for which the organization was created.

The effect of gamma rays on men, movies, magazines

An event will soon occur which happens only once every 179 years. And no, it is not the arrival of Halley's Comet.

The event has been heralded as the harbinger of bad fortune for life on earth.

Others have said it is a good omen. Most scientists say it is not an omen at all, simply a natural phenomenon.

What is this debated event? It's simply that all of the planets will be on the same side of the sun, exerting gravitational pull in one direction.

The effect of the moon's gravitational pull on the earth's oceans tides is well known. And the moon even has a small effect on the earth's land masses.

So what is going to happen when all of the planets are exerting their pull in the same direction? What will be the effect on the earth?

SOME DOOMSAYERS are predicting massive earthquakes, an increase in volcanic activity and flooding high tides. That is not even counting the effects they say it will have on humans.

The more gloomy of the celestial prophets are predicting effects such asthose created by the effect of the full or new moon. But only on a grander scale.

Murders and other violent crimes are supposed to increase. The streets will not be safe for anyone. Werewolves appear when there is a full moon. What other strange creatures may appear during this near-alignment of the planets?

All new horror stories may evolve out of this rare occurrence. Hollywood will probably be watching very closely for drive-in movie script ideas.

The speculation includes theories about what the alignment will do to the sun. Some people have suggested that the sun will develop increased sunspot activity. Or that unbelievably huge solar flares will lash out at the closer planets. Even the earth may be affected by increased radiation.

ALL OF THIS is mere speculation. No one really knows what will happen.

But there are those of us who have our own ideas.

What will really happen is the great deficit budget will be erased by a glitch in the government computers caused by the gravitational pull and the increased sunspot activity. The United States government will be able to start from scratch, maybe buying another two hundred years of time until the deficit reaches $1 trillion.

Another effect is likely to be an uninterrupted baseball season. The stars will tell the players and owners that the public will not stand for a disgrace like last year's truncated season.

THE PLANETS will rule the professional football scene in a completely different manner. Fitting, because the game is entirely different. Instead of avoiding a strike, the alignment will precipitate one.

As the fateful day of March 10 draws closer, public figures will be affected by the alignment.

Ayatollah Khomeini will start a television ministry to make up for the losses of oil revenue.

Leonid Brezhnev will admit that he likes hot dogs and baseball, and that he has a videotape of "Knute Rockne, All-American."

Volcanic activity will wipe out El Salvador, ending the apprehension about a new Vietnam.

The National Enquirer will run a year-long series of articles and interviews with famous people who will claim their lives have been changed by the planets' configuration. One famous movie star will admit to becoming especially hirsute and anti-social because of the mystical effects of the plan.

THE ENQUIRER will naturally attribute this to drugs and alcohol, ignoring the natural phenomenon.

The Enquirer will also run a story detailing the positive effects of bathing in the glow of the bright planets. Planetary light will be seen as a cure for cancer, venereal disease, the common cold and hangnails.

An internationally known physician from the St. Rita Hospital and Delicatessen will vouch for the authenticity of the cures.

Now, of course, these are only speculations. Any of these things might happen. Then again, none may occur.

Believe what you will.

But get out and witness this once-in-many-lifetimes happening and enjoy the wonders of the universe.

Woman gives thanks to unknown good Samaritans

Editor,

I want to thank you. I don't know your names but I know something about you. I know you are the ones who got involved when you could have just as easily moved on about the business of your own life. I want to thank you for caring...for caring enough to help until the ambulance came.

It made a difference to me that night, Jan. 21. It was after the concert at McCain Auditorium. We stepped out into the cold wind, with treacherous ice underfoot, and I slipped and fell. I knew my arm was broken. You put your coats around me. Through the hurt and panic I knew that there were those who cared.

It is enough for a doctor to set a nasty break without having a patient in shock. It was a cold and bitter wind you felt that night while we waited for the ambulance. I don't know your names but I know the kind of people you are.

I thank each of you for taking care of me that night.

Media distorts concepts of nuclear power industry

Editor,

I would like to present a factual version of what Kelly Blair wrote about in the Feb. 5 Collegian. On May 1, 1981 there were 76 nuclear reactors with operating licenses, 81 with construction permits, two with limited work authorizations and 15 on order. Four reactors began commercial operation in 1981 and four reactors were cancelled. Eight reactors are expected to begin commercial operation this year and 56 more will follow through 1990.

According to Electrical World (Dec. 81), nuclear power plants are expected to continue to produce electricity at less cost per unit output than coal plants in 9 out of 10 Department of Energy regions in the U.S. The economic problems of our country are causing problems in the construction of all types of power plants — not just nuclear.

The fact that a nuclear power plant (as with a coal power plant) is typically designed for a 30-year life does not mean that no equipment failures will occur during that 30 year period. No "entire reactor steam generator systems" have been replaced in any commercial reactor plants in the U.S., not even at Three Mile Island. Many of the steam generator tubes have been replaced, but there are about 180 miles of this tubing in a large nuclear power plant and it is not unreasonable to expect or experience some tube leaks or ruptures over the 30-year period.

The "continual plant breakdowns" have somehow still resulted in nuclear power plants having some of the highest plant capacity factors in the electrical power producing business.

Each industry suffers when it experiences a large accident, especially if it causes the deaths of many innocent persons, such as the skywalk failure in Kansas City or the recent rash of coal mine and airline accidents. Fortunately, the nuclear power industry has not experienced any such accident, nor is it likely to do so in the future. The nuclear power industry's biggest problem is the news media, which presents an unresearched, non-factual viewpoint that promotes the existence of the nuclear boogey-man.

Theft tops list of crime at K-State; Stone says attitude may be cause

By DOUG WARD
Collegian Reporter

You can turn your head or you might just close your eyes. But every time you do, it only gets worse.

Theft. It's the number one crime problem on campus.

There were 475 cases of theft reported to the Department of Security and Traffic last year, according to Capt. Gary Gillaspie.

Attitude is probably the single most important contributing factor, according to Art Stone, director of Security and Traffic.

A college is an unfortunate place because many things are left laying around. Many students believe that because this is a college campus there is no crime, Stone explained.

"People who have this philosophy are in dreamland," he said.

The problem is many people have the attitude "if it's not mine then it doesn't concern me," he said. "No one wants to be involved."

THIS ATTITUDE is prevalent throughout the country, according to Stone.

"I would say that in at least 50 percent of the crimes that occur on this campus, there is someone in the area who saw the crime but doesn't want to be involved," Stone said.

"All we can do is ask questions, investigate the incident and keep talking about measures of prevention," Stone said.

Recent incidents of theft in Seaton Hall have increased the concern of the dean of the College of Architecture and Design, Bernd Foerster.

"The problem with stealing has increased and at the moment is at an all time high," Foerster said.

Unrecovered property invariably causes a financial burden for someone, and students cannot always afford to replace stolen articles, Foerster said.

"When anything is taken, somebody has to pay the bill," Stone said. "When it's University property, we're all paying."

Thefts may cause students to do their projects at home which would be detrimental to their education, Foerster explained, since working in a studio is important because the surroundings are similar to what students might encounter in a job situation.

STUDENTS IN THE College of Architecture and Design each have their own work table and because of a need for continuous contact, their station is available 24 hours a day, according to Foerster.

Most thefts in Seaton Hall occur in areas of easier access, or when fewer people are around, Foerster said.

"There are more open areas in Seaton Hall because of the need for use," Stone said. "Proportionally, however, it is no better or worse than any other area on campus."

Concern from users of studios in Bluemont Hall has prompted issuance of identification cards and keys for 70 students, according to Eugene Wendt, assistant professor of pre-design professions.

The cards and keys have matching numbers and allow for the identification of persons who use the facilities after hours, Stone said.

"The identification cards will restrict students to the floors they need to be on and let others know that they (students) are supposed to be in the building," Wendt said.

THERE HAS BEEN no theft problem in Bluemont Hall, he added, but the identification system is being initiated as a general security measure.

George Ham, head of the Department of Agronomy, also reported no theft problems since his department moved to Throckmorton Hall in August.

"While we were in Waters Hall, there were some theft problems because there had been many keys issued over the years," Ham said, "but since we've moved to Throckmorton, there has been no problem. We attempt to keep all labs and offices locked and we control theft with a limited issuance of keys."

There are two basic ways to reduce overall crime, according to Gillaspie.

"You can reduce the desire to commit the crime or you can reduce the opportunity," he explained. "The second method is easiest to carry out."

Ways to reduce the opportunity for theft include keeping things locked, reporting suspicious activity and asking questions, Gillaspie said.

"People must be alert," Stone said. "If they see someone that doesn't belong, many people often look the other way."

REDUCING THE desire to commit a crime is more difficult, Stone said. Desire is determined by several factors — whether or nor the thief thinks he will get caught and whether he wants to steal or work.

There are nine security officers on duty from about 9 p.m. to 5 a.m. each night to insure the safety and welfare of the buildings and the users of the buildings on campus, according to Stone.

The security officers patrol buildings and check for fires, unlocked areas within the buildings or unauthorized individuals. The officers are noncommissioned and have no police power, but are radio equipped and report anything they encounter back to Security and Traffic, Stone said.

An important backup to security and patrol officers are the campus custodial personnel, he added.

BUILDING USERS are usually the first to notice if anything is out of line, but because the custodians are in the building night after night, they are probably second most likely to notice changes, Stone explained.

Forum speaker stresses hugging, speaking-out

The next time someone scratches his head, it may not be a sign of dandruff. Instead, it could be a unique form of body language.

A nationally known speaker, humorist and non-verbal communication specialist, Jayne Lybrand, spoke Thursday night before a full-house at Forum Hall.

The topic of her speech, "Body Language Plus," stressed how you can "put your feet to your dreams and get walkin'."

People see and hear what they want — if a person can't hear, then he can't communicate, Lybrand said.

"People are afraid to touch people" and the first rule of body language is don't sweat, and the second rule is "once you touch someone don't move or you will never get your hand back," she explained.

Common gestures signify meanings — a person has to pay attention to word and hand actions, Lybrand stated.

"I feel that five hugs a day are necessary to feel good about ourselves," she said.

People must be aware of how others move and talk, since distance can show the emotion of a person, Lybrand said.

Saying what you feel, appropriately, instantly, and as quickly as possible to the people you feel it towards, was Lybrand's definition of communication. She added that sharing your feelings with another person and having them perceive it as you meant it is communication.

Lybrand suggested a screening system that included how to say what you feel, and as a result, create a stronger, better relationship that would help a learn to share your feelings.

People are improving their communication when they can deal with others who are difficult, she explained.

"Never knock down the only person that is applauding you in an empty auditorium," Lybrand added.

According to Lybrand, a person should place emphasis on not letting other people control his life, but instead should "listen to what they have to say and move on."

If a person wants to be a winner, he has to have friends that are winners — "if you are programmed to fail, re-program to win," she said. By looking at failure, one should realize that it is only a dress rehearsal for success, Lybrand added.

"We spend a fortune on the outside and charge our own battery," she said. "If we think about our attitude, punch a ticket, then we can live."

The key to success is "doing what you want to do and getting paid for it." she explained. Each person has about seven different occupations in their lifetime, she said, "you have to think big with your career, it is the only life you will ever have."

Someone from the audience asked Lybrand how she decided on her profession. She responded with, "I didn't wait for anybody to tell me I could. I am today because of living my yesterday with an open eye."

Severance

oil and gas industry with another tax besides the local property tax, which cost them about $104 million last year. They also argued against the tax saying it would erode many counties' tax bases by lowering assessed valuations on propety with oil and gas production.

IN ADDITION, the opponents charged that a severance tax would be passed along to Kansas consumers in the form of higher utility bills as natural gas and coal prices are boosted to offset the tax.

House Majority Leader Robert Frey (R-Liberal) took a different approach in his opposition to the severance tax:

"I believe the severance tax should fail, not because it would be a detriment to the people in my district, not because it is unfair to tax so heavily one industry, but because this tax is being advocated to raise funds simply not needed for the continued operation of state government."

THE THREE proposals before the committee are:

— Carlin's plan for a 5 percent tax on oil and gas and a 2 percent tax on coal production. It would exempt royalty owners and small production wells, generating about $118 million in the next fiscal year.

— House Speaker Wendell Lady's proposal for a 3 percent tax on oil and gas, generating about $76 million. The Overland Park Republican also would give a rebate to counties to offset tax base loss, and wants a 3-cent-a-gallon boost in the motor fuels tax.

— A plan by Rep. Kerry Patrick (R-Leawood) and three other House Republicans for a 7 percent severance tax, offset by a credit for the property tax paid on oil and gas property. It would generate about $176 million.

Also a fourth bill, calling for a 2 percent severance tax, has been introduced and hearings on it are scheduled next week.

Senate hears fund requests postpones ticket resolution

First reading of a resolution proposing changes in the basketball ticket sales procedure was postponed another week by Student Senate last night.

The postponement was due to Doug Dodds, senate chairman, being ill and the absence of John Gilliam, junior in agricultural education and the resolution's sponsor.

Gilliam, who was reached at home, said several changes would be made in the resolution before it is read at next week's Senate meeting. He was not sure exactly what changes would be made, but said the resolution would probably be moved to special orders so that it would be read and voted on at the same meeting, since it will be the last meeting of this senate session.

A bill was passed at the meeting allocating funds for 400 social services brochures. They would list all the social services available to students, said Esther Hagen, senior in home economics and sponsor of the bill. The money will be paid out of the reserves for contingencies.

Senators also heard the first reading of a bill which would allocate $700 to MEChA, a Mexican-American student organization. The money would be used to pay the expenses of a speaker for the Festival Hispano Americano in April.

Crime

A custodian knows the area he is in and becomes accustomed to the people who use the area. As a result, a custodian would be more aware than a security officer of any unusual activity in the building, Stone said.

"The best recognition is personal recognition," Stone said.

Theft is also the primary crime problem at the University of Kansas, according to Mary Ann Robinson, sergeant in community services at KU.

Robinson speculated that the major causes of theft on the KU campus were articles left unattended and things left unlocked.

"We have been hit hard in parking lot areas with theft of wheel covrs," she said. "This is a community problem within the city (of Lawrence) and in the Kansas City area also."

What does the community service division at KU do to help prevent theft?

"We give crime prevention talks, hand out literature, employ security officers and do a lot of engraving of property," Robinson said.

"We try to make people aware," she added.

At Wichita State University, theft of unattended property is also the biggest crime problem, according to Milton Myers, chief of Campus Police.

FAILURE TO TAKE proper precautions is the major reason for the theft problem, Myers said.

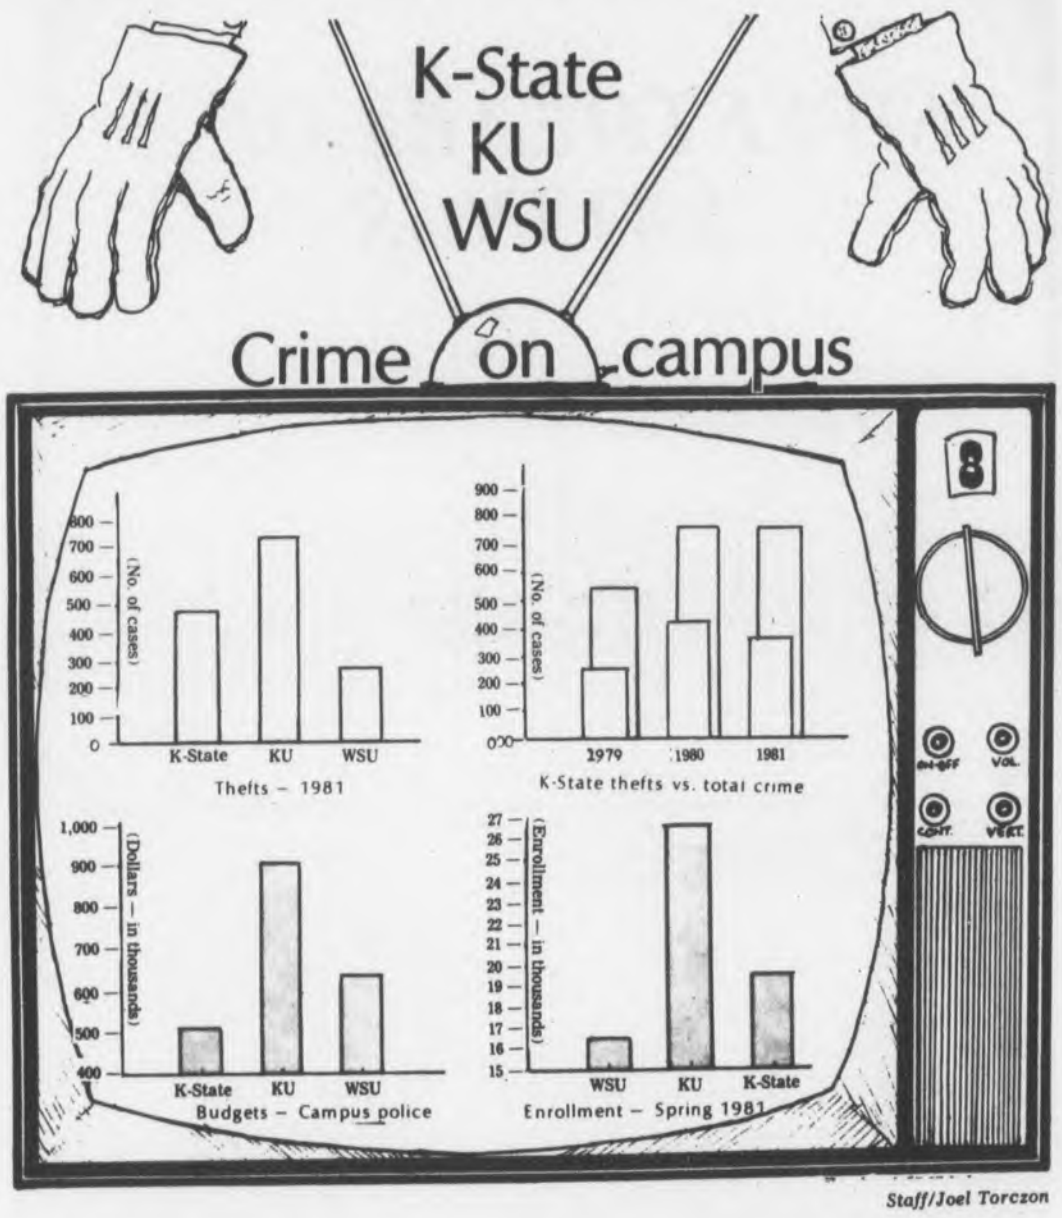
The employment of student officers has been successful in reducing crimes against persons on the Wichita State campus, Myers said. The student officers are responsible for patrolling buildings and residence halls on campus and are "the eyes and ears of the campus police," Myers said.

A homicide on the Wichita State campus in May 1977 prompted school officials to initiate the student officer program, according to Myers.

"Parents were concerned about the safety of students after the homicide occurred," he said. "Something had to be done and this program was one of the things we did to try to prevent further incidents.

"We have no problem with violent crime primarily because of the student officer program," Myers said.

In a Jan. 25 article in Newsweek magazine, it was reported that violent crimes on the University of Southern California (USC) campus had increased 150 per cent in the last four years. It also told about crime problems at California State University-Los Angeles, University of Alabama at Birmingham and Duke University.



"Compared to some of these places," Gillaspie said, "we don't have a crime problem at K-State."

According to the Newsweek article, there is a security force of 54 officers at USC, and at Duke University the public safety director is working under a $1.5 million budget.

Security and Traffic's budget last year totaled $512,800, including operating expenses, and Stone said his force of 25 officers is adequate at the present time.

K-State's location and the background of its students are possibly the major reasons that there is less violent crime on the campus, Stone said.

"But," he cautioned, "I'm not saying that it can't happen here."

Confession

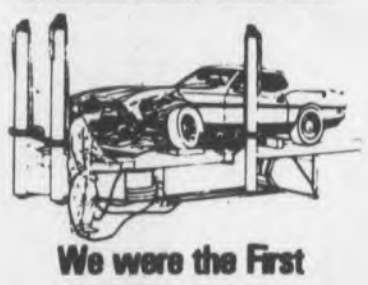
HENDERSON HAS been charged with the shooting deaths of his wife's parents, Ivan and Marie Barnett, and their 11-year-old son, on Jan. 21 inside their home in Cherry Fork, Ohio.

Charlotte deputies said Henderson told them he had killed a woman in South Carolina, a woman in Mississippi, a man in Louisiana, and five people in Florida — Ferderber, the three hitchhikers and a store clerk in East Palatka.

The Jan. 25 death of Dorothy Wilkinson in a clothing store in East Palatka had been ruled a natural death by the district medical examiner, who said she died of a ruptured aneurism. Miller said the case was being re-examined in light of Henderson's statements.

FERDERBER, WHO headed a department at Presbyterian-University Hospital in Pittsburgh for 34 years and pioneered in geriatric medicine, retired to Florida in 1976.

When he was arrested Saturday, police said Henderson was carrying a .22-caliber pistol stolen from the home of his inlaws.



Pearl said Henderson's statements to police would be examined to see if they were admissible in court.

Proposed 'phase-outs' target student benefits

By TIM MORSE
Collegian Reporter

Social security beneficiaries and dependents who are attending college will be forced to tighten their belts with the upcoming "phase-outs" proposed by President Reagan and enacted by Congress.

Reagan's proposal involves a three-year period of gradual reduction in benefits given to eligible students.

According to Bob Evans, director of Student Financial Assistance, the Social Security Adminstration (SSA) has not communicated well with beneficiaries in making the financial changes known. The SSA lists three criteria that students must meet to be able to receive benefits as a "phase-out" student.

Evans explained the criteria in three divisions.

— The student must be entitled to insurance benefits as a student as of August 1981.
— The student should not be receiving disability payments prior to August 1982.
— The student must be enrolled full-time at a post-secondary institution prior to May 1982.

STUDENTS NEED not be age 18 prior to August 1982 as has been mandated in the past, he said.

The students who meet these requirements will continue to receive Social Security benefits until they finish school, attain age 21, or until April 1985, whichever comes first, according to Evans.

Another change made by the SSA was the elimination of aid during May, June, July and August.

"There will be no future general benefit increases and the amount of future payments will be gradually reduced as follows:

— 25 percent less effective with September 1982 checks due on October 1.
— 50 percent less effective with September 1983 checks.
— 75 percent less effective with September 1984 checks.

"There will be no further checks after April 1985," Evans said.

EVANS EXPRESSED alarm about the cuts and wants students to be aware of them. He commented that most students who receive Social Security benefits were probably expecting to get the same aid as they received the previous year, but that it would be reduced somewhat.

Student Aid News, a higher education daily newspaper, reported that critics of the benefit changes are disgruntled with the SSA for not making the cuts more publically known. The SSA claimed it has informed students and school officials of the changes via reports distributed by local government offices.

BECAUSE FEW STUDENTS or counselors know of the changes, financial aid packages drawn up for next fall may not reflect the true need of a student counting on the aid, according to John Mallan, vice president of government relations for the Anerican Association of State Colleges and Universities.

According to Student Aid News, concern about Social Security student benefits has led to the recent introduction of two bills in Congress — one to delay the end of benefits for new students and another to strike all student benefit changes made in the budget.

Another bill, if passed, would postpone the elimination of benefits until October and thus allow this year's high school seniors to get Social Security checks. Evans said he does not expect the bill to pass and postponement is unlikely.

The cuts proposed were supported by congressional vote and are not reflective of the University's laws in distributing financial aid to Social Security beneficiaries and their dependents.

"There is no need to panic, but we don't want these students (Social Security beneficiaries) to be in the dark," Evans said.

Lytle to jump for 'Cats, ventures to 'Big Apple'

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Billy Olson, seeking to become the first pole vaulter to clear 19 feet indoors, will have history riding on his side Friday night in the 75th Wanamaker Millrose Games at Madison Square Garden, New York.

And K-State's Doug Lytle will be looking to make some history of his own, as he continues his dream to become the first Wildcat to pole vault 18 feet.

Forty years ago, in the Millrose Games, Cornelius Warmerdam made track and field history by becoming the first vaulter to clear 15 feet indoors, and 20 years ago, John Uelses was the first to soar 16 feet indoors, in the same meet.

"I'll be going all out (to clear 19 feet)," said the 23-year-old Olson, the sensation of the 1982 indoor season. "I'll be pulling out all stops."

Olson already has broken three indoor records this season. On Jan.16, he smashed the American indoor mark by leaping 18-6× in the U.S. Olympic Invitational at East Rutherford, N.J. On Jan.29, he bettered the world indoor best by vaulting 18-8† in the Toronto Star Maple Leaf Indoor Games, and last Saturday night, he broke that record by clearing 18-9± in the Portland Federal-Mason Dixon Games at Louisville, Ky.

"I think there is the possibility you will see the first 19-foot pole vault indoors Friday night," said meet director Howard Schmertz. "Olson just missed going over at that height in Toronto. He brushed the bar."

Actually, he got over the bar easily, but he threw his arms back too hard as he began his descent, knocking over the bar.

Olson, three-time NAIA champion while at Abilene Christian University in Abilene, Texas, also has won at Philadelphia, Kansas City and Dallas this season, and leads the indoor Mobil Grand Prix circuit with 110 points. It has been a remarkable comeback for Olson, who missed the entire 1981 indoor season after suffering a broken left arm in a gymnastics accident in late 1980 and was in a cast for six months.

Olson and Lytle will be joined by a host of 1982 record-setters in the Millrose Games.

Among them are Renaldo Nehemiah in the 60-yard high hurdles, Carl Lewis in the long jump, Stanley Floyd in the 60-yard dash, Don Paige in the 1,000 meters, Mary Decker in the women's mile, Debbie Brill in the women's high jump, Evelyn Ashford and Jeanette Bolden in the women's 60-yard dash, Candy Young in the women's 60-yard hurdles, and Jim Heiring in the mile walk.

Other top competitors include Herschel Walker and Mel Lattany in the men's dash, Dwight Stones and Franklin Jacobs in the men's high jump, Alberto Salazar and Suleiman Nyambui in the 5,000 meters, Steve Scott and John Walker in the men's mile, Earl Bell and Dan Ripley in the pole vault, Rod Milburn in the men's hurdles, Larry Myricks in the long jump, Stephanie Hightower in the women's hurdles, Francie Larrieu in the women's mile and Joni Huntley in the women's high jump.

Tracksters return to Ahearn to host quadrangular meet

So far this season, the K-State men's and women's track squads have found little success winning on the road. After suffering defeats to Kansas and Nebraska, the Wildcats are hoping things might change this weekend.

The Wildcats, who have competed in all road meets thus far this season, will try to turn things around Saturday in Ahearn Field House as they compete in a quadrangular meet against the University of Colorado, North Texas State University and Wichita State University.

The meet, which is scheduled to begin at noon, will feature some of the top athletes in the Midwest.

"I expect this to be a well balanced meet," head coach Steve Miller said. "All the teams show strength in at least one area.

"North Texas State has a couple of outstanding sprinters and jumpers," Miller said. He pointed out sprinter Rudy Levarity, a native of the Bahamas who specializes in the 60-yard dash and 300-yard run. "You can say that he is one of the best sprinters in the country."

For Colorado, Miller singled out distance runner Mark Scrutton as a major factor. The British native is the defending Big Eight Conference champion in cross country and in the 5,000 and 10,000-meter runs. Besides being Big Eight champion, Scrutton also finished in the top five at national competition last year in the three-mile run.

Leading the way for the Wildcats will be pole vaulter Doug Lytle who set a school record last Saturday by jumping 17 feet 8 inches. On Wednesday, he flew to New York City and competed in the Melrose Games at Madison Square Garden.

According to Miller, the meet should be relatively even.

"There will be some outstanding performers from each team at the meet," he said. "North Texas will have Levarity and WSU will have an outstanding middle distance runner in George Collier. However, when comparing all four teams, K-State will have more team depth."

Men and women...

The men's basketball team will continue its road trip Saturday, traveling to Ames, Iowa, to play the Iowa State Cyclones. The Wildcats lost to Oklahoma 68-58 Wednesday while Iowa State fell to Colorado, 74-64.

K-State now stands 6-3 in the Big Eight and 16-5 overall. The 'Cats are in second place behind the Missouri Tigers who are 9-1 in the league. Iowa State is 2-7 in Big Eight competition and 7-14 overall. The Cyclones are in seventh place in the league.

In the season opener between the two teams, K-State came out on top, 75-55. Guards Tyrone Adams, Ed Galvao and Tim Jankovich combined for 42 points or 17 of 28 from the field in the early season victory in Manhattan.

Jankovich has averaged 10.8 points per game and has shot 56 percent in the last five outings against the Cyclones. The Wildcats have won four in a row against Iowa State.

For Saturday's game, Head Coach Jack Hartman said that it will be necessary for the Wildcats to control the tempo.

"Iowa State is quick and they have some great perimeter shooters. We must guard against letting them dictate the game's tempo and allowing them to get into their shooting rhythm," Hartman said.

Iowa State is led in scoring by Barry Stevens. The 6-foot-5 forward is averaging 13 points per game. Ron Harris, 6-foot-3 guard, is scoring 12 each game and 6-foot-6 center Robert Estes averages nine points.

In other games around the Big Eight, Missouri will travel to Oklahoma State to face the Cowboys who are 5-4 in the conference. Nebraska, also 5-4, will play at Kansas, 3-6. Oklahoma, 5-4 will host Colorado, 2-8.

...travel to Iowa State

The women's basketball team has taken to the road again. After dropping Creighton 79-49 last night, the Wildcats are now 17-5 with nine straight wins, four of which were on the road.

Angie Bonner led the 'Cats in scoring with 23 points, 21 of which came in the second half as K-State added to its 32-28 halftime advantage. Priscilla Gary had 15 points and 10 rebounds. Erin Schreiber had 14 points to join Bonner and Gary in double figures.

The Wildcats will travel to Iowa State for the first half of the doubleheader in Ames.

"We are anticipating a tough game," Head Coach Lynn Hickey said. "With their home-court advantage we look at this as being a good game. Iowa State did some nice things in the Big Eight tournament, but they are at a disadvantage with the loss of their good point guard."

The loss of guard Tracy Eckert has had an effect on the Cyclones. Eckert injured her knee in the second game of the Big Eight tournament a month ago. She was Iowa State's all-time assist leader with a 10.6 scoring average.

Since Eckert's injury, the Cyclones have added only two wins, out of the last seven games, to their 8-14 record.

In last year's match between the two teams, the Wildcats defeated the Cyclones 98-62 in the first round of the K-State Adidas Invitational. Leading K-State to its victory was Tammie Romstad who scored 26 points and pulled down 15 rebounds.

Romstad is expected to perform just as well in Saturday's match. The 6-2 center leads the team in field-goal percentage. She is hitting 56 percent and averaging 16.4 points a game.

Also helping the 'Cats on the boards is Gary who is grabbing 5.5 a game. Gary is leading the team in scoring with 18 points a game.

Kromm solves dilemma by publishing textbook

By CATHY KARLIN
Collegian Reporter

Yes, he did include some of the trivia that ornaments his classroom lectures. But more importantly, David Kromm made sure that in writing his textbook, "World Regional Geography," he included a "richly diverse" representation of the entire world.

A desire to set geography straight, in textbook form, motivated Kromm, professor of geography, to write his own book.

"There were several things about existing world regional geography textbooks that disappointed me," Kromm said. "When I'd mention my opinions to the textbook publishers they'd say, 'We'll publish your book, if you'll write one'."

HE BEGAN writing the book in January 1977 and finished in January 1981. It is currently being used at 32 colleges and universities in 20 different states.

"I wanted a scholarly interpretation that reflected the rich diversification of the world that gives the reader a sense of place," Kromm said. "So many of the available textbooks don't acknowledge the many individual differences of countries or regions. The writers make the countries sound as if they are all the same, have the same characteristics."

Kromm wanted his readers to get a "real feeling" for the countries they were reading about so he read scholarly works and novels from all parts of the world.

"It's amazing how a novel set in Spain, for example, can give you such a tremendous feeling for Spain with such rich detail and insight. I tried to include this sort of realistic atmosphere in my book."

PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN from satellites are an important feature of his book which was the first college geographical textbook to use this type of photo, according to Kromm.

"A student can get such a good, clear perspective of what the earth really looks like from above...," Kromm said.

Another characteristic of available geography textbooks that Kromm dislikes is that most are not comprehensive.

"In the past, all geography books I've seen have left out parts of the world, either the South Pacific Islands and Australia, or the Antarctic regions," Kromm said.

IN HIS BOOK, Kromm divided the world into 12 major world regions, plus a chapter on Antarctica.

The "rather odd" organizational systems other textbooks use also receive Kromm's criticism.

A textbook formerly used at K-State illustrates Kromm's point. Japan was listed in the table of contents as a satellite of North America, and Australia was listed as a satellite of Europe.

IN ADDITION to reading novels from different areas of the world, Kromm gathered materials from the United Nations and consulted with 35 regional-specialist geographers throughout the United States and Canada.

"I had tremendous assistance," Kromm said. "We could discuss what really are the most important topics in the country of their specialty. They were also a fantastic source of photographs."

Extensive travel in Europe, the Soviet Union, Mexico and the United States and 15 years of teaching experience also aided Kromm in writing his book.

USING A TEXTBOOK written by the professor was considered to be a positive factor by some of the students taking Kromm's geography class.

"For his way of teaching the book compliments his teaching abilities naturally," said Jill Markiewica, freshman in elementary education.

There's a lot of detail without it seeming to be too cluttered. The best part is the photography. They are really nice and really representative of the countries' true appearance," Leta Gattshall, senior in preveterinary medicine, said.

Student receives award at Iowa theater festival

By JOY CULVER
Collegian Reporter

Most people who dream of having their name in lights never get the opportunity. But Mary Peterson, senior in theater, seems well on her way to achieving that.

She won the Regional Irene Ryan Acting Scholarship at the Regional American College Theater Festival in Cedar Falls, Iowa, last month. The scholarship pays $750, Peterson said.

Peterson is the first person from K-State to win this scholarship. Her nomination to audition at the festival came from her portrayal of Honey in last semester's production of "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf," according to Harold Nichols, professor of speech.

The Cedar Falls festival is one of 12 nationwide festivals. It is sponsored by the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, D.C. All colleges and universities in the United States are invited to send a videotape of one or more of their productions in order to be selected for an audition at the festival, Peterson said.

PRELIMINARY SCREENINGS opened the festival and narrowed the competition to 21 candidates. Seven candidates went to the finals, she said.

After being selecting for finals, Peterson had 15 minutes to prepare for her audition. Each candidate was required to do one partner scene and a six-minute solo scene, Peterson said.

"he partner scene was the most comfortable I've ever felt on stage," she said. "I felt like a winner even before anything was announced."

When it was announced that Peterson had won, she said she was really excited.

"It was kind of like your first kiss, you know, stars, stripes and fireworks," she said. "It was really quite a thrill."

THE WINNER OF the regional festival advances to the national festival in Washington, D.C. The Kennedy Center pays all expenses and awards two $2,500 scholarships to two contestants.

Peterson will compete in Washington, D.C., the last weekend in April, she said. Workshops will also be given by theater leaders.

Peterson, who said she has wanted to be an actress since seventh grade, plans to work wth a repertory company or theater group after graduation, she said. She would then like to go to graduate school, she said.

Theater is Peterson's first love and she has studied costuming and construction design as well as acting, she said.

She hopes to try the lights of New York someday, Peterson said.

"I definitely want to leave the Midwest," she said.

This year's nomination to the regional festival was Peterson's second. She was previously nominated while attending Dodge City Community College.

Oriental designs now on display

Original Oriental art will be exhibited and sold today from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the Art Building as a presentation by Marson Ltd. of Baltimore, Md.

The exhibit includes prints from the 18th and 19th centuries, according to Charles Stroh, head of the art department. Marson Ltd. deals with mostly Japanese art, he said.

The exhibit has been on display in the Union, but because the Art Building has available space this year, it was planned to be presented there, Stroh said.

"The art department has a problem with space available as far as exhibiting its work is concerned," he said. "We share the Art Gallery in the Union with the Union Program Council and recently McCain Auditorium added additional security, therefore we can utilize available space there," Stroh said.

The art department has several programs planned following the Oriental Art display and sale, including the Art Department Senior Show, Student Comprehensive Show, the Bachelor of Fine Arts Show and the Graduate Student Show.

U.S.-Soviet talks continue despite threat of deadlock

GENEVA, Switzerland (AP) — American and Soviet negotiators, amid mounting indications of an impasse, conferred for 2½ hours Thursday in the 15th full round of talks on limiting medium-range nuclear arms in Europe.

The session followed a pointed exchange between Washington and Moscow, highlighting the distance between the two sides at the politically sensitive talks.

The Reagan administration said Wednesday it rejects as "spurious" a Soviet proposal to reduce medium-range nuclear strength to "300 units on both sides" by 1990.

A U.S. State Department spokesman said the plan would leave untouched the most formidable intermediate-range weapon in the Soviet arsenal, the triple-headed, mobile SS-20 missile. A major American objective at the talks has been to dismantle the SS-20s.

About 280 SS-20 systems, capable of hitting targets anywhere in Europe, have already been deployed. The West has no comparable intermediate-range weapon in place.

The revised Soviet offer was disclosed Tuesday in Moscow. At the same time the Kremlin assailed as "absurd" a draft treaty submitted last week by the American delegation. The United States proposed that both sides dismantle or cancel plans to deploy a variety of sophisticated missile systems. The offer, commonly called the "zero option," has been likened by the Kremlin to unilateral disarmament.

The exchange between Washington and Moscow was the second in 10 days, and indicated that the bargaining teams have made little progress in bridging the wide differences evident as the talks began Nov. 30.

Early retirement to shift defense in Soviet's favor

WASHINGTON (AP) — Sen. J.J. Exon (D-Neb.) charged Thursday that the United States was "unilaterally disarming" in retiring long-range Titan missiles before the new, multiple-warhead MX mobile missiles are deployed in 1986.

Under critical questioning from Exon and Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) at a Senate hearing, Gen. Lew Allen Jr., the Air Force chief of staff, conceded that retirement of the aging Titan missiles starting this October would shift the nuclear balance, at least temporarily, "in the wrong direction."

Exon spoke of the alleged "window of vulnerability" that U.S. strategic ground forces face from Soviet efforts to achieve nuclear superiority, a gap that President Reagan entered office promising to close.

The Reagan administration originally planned to replace the 52 liquid-fueled Titans simultaneously with new MX missiles. It later decided to begin retiring the Titans in October 1982, virtually completing the job before the first MX missile is ready for deployment four years later.

During a hearing by the Senate Armed Services Committee, Allen said the early retirement of Titans was justified by the projected savings of $500 million over five years and safety considerations. There have been accidental spills of toxic Titan fuel in recent years, including two fatal accidents near Rock, Kan., and Damascus, Ark.

Exon said the savings argument "seems to me not a very sound argument if we are concerned about the window of vulnerability." Exon said the Titans' huge single warheads account for about one-third of the megatonnage, or explosive power, in the U.S. nuclear arsenal.

Exon said that "what we are doing is unilaterally disarming" while "the Soviet Union is aiming about 12 additional warheads a month at us or our allies. And this administration is recommending to save a pittance compared with the $216 billion budget" it wants for the Defense Department in fiscal 1983 starting Oct. 1.

However, Allen explained that the air-launched cruise missile and other nuclear weapons will be placed in service as the Titans and the oldest model B-52 bombers are retired. This will keep overall U.S. nuclear power from being reduced, he said.

Levin, a firm opponent of the MX missile system, said it did not make "any coherent and logical sense" for the administration to contend that the weapon must be built before its permanent basing arrangement has been decided, on the ground that the threat of U.S. vulnerability demands quick action.

'Make it any color... ...as long as it's red'

A message scrawled to a lover from a death-row convict in 269 A.D. has turned into one of the largest profit-making traditions for the greeting card industry.

Valentine's Day — when lovers express their deepest feelings, when friends and relatives remember those they care about, when grade-schoolers twitter in the corner over the valentine received by their newest sweetheart.

People quarrel over the origin of Valentine's Day, but the most widely accepted belief is the story of St. Valentine.

While awaiting execution for being a Christian martyr, St. Valentine fell in love with the blind daughter of his jailer. Through his faith he restored her sight. He signed his farewell message to her "from your Valentine," a phrase that has become an everlasting symbol of friendship, affection, caring and love.

SINCE THE EARLIEST known valentine, sent in 1415, there have been some dramatic changes.

The lace, the frills, the sweetly rhymed messages have always been classified as traditional valentines. Such cards are still part of the valentine tradition, but slowly a new style is expanding in the market.

According to John Dinardo, manager of public information at Hallmark Cards Inc., Kansas City, Mo., the traditional valentines seem to be losing ground to straight-forward prose and more graphics.

"It's a concept held over from the '60s when there was a reaction to anything sensing of sweetness" which depicted insincerity, Dinardo said. It's back to the concept of "telling it like it is", he added.

Hearts and cupids will never leave the market, according to Dinardo, but other designs are becoming prevalent. Oriental designs and photography are fast becoming best sellers.

Another reason for this trend away from frills and sweetness is the change in the greeting-card consumers' age.

"The majority (of buyers) are in their late 20s, early 30s," Dinardo said. "They are more sophisticated."

ALSO INFLUENCING the change in cards has been the influx of women into the job market.

"They are no longer male-dominated verses," Dinardo said. The cards don't praise women for household duties or womanly charms anymore, but rather for being a good friend, partner and companion.

Valentine's Day is one of the few occasions that men buy cards, Dinardo said. It's not surprising that they buy cards, but it is surprising to discover what kinds of cards they do buy.

"Men will buy the most sentimental, mushy, loving cards," Dinardo said. "The words have to be just right."

Women approach the day in a sort of casual and blase manner, he said. They buy the most comical cards and don't feel like the world will crumble if they can't find a card just right for their tastes, he added.

ACCORDING TO a Hallmark publication, there used to be one rule of thumb to follow when designing a valentine: "Make it any color...as long as it's red."

No longer will you be able to enter a card shop and find the rows and rows of red-and-white valentines typical of every other year.

Burgandy and blue seem to be the popular off-colors this year, Dinardo said.

The color change arose mainly out of boredom, he said. An off-colored card shows contrast, catches a buyer's eye and produces the best results.

Finding just the right card may be a tedious process, but few know the work they are rejecting when they place a card back on the shelf.

Each card goes through 300 steps involving 3,000 people. The plans are sent from Hallmark in Kansas City to various Hallmark production companies throughout the country. The cards come back in the form of lithographic sheets. The sheets are cut, flocked, flittered, coated, dyed, glued, laminated, embossed, die cut, engraved, glossed and printed.

FROM THE ORIGINAL idea to the finished product, the process takes 18 months.

Many Hallmark artists and writers are now working on cards for Easter 1984.

"Ask an artist what year it is, and they'll usually have to stop and think," Dinardo said.

(See VALENTINE, p. 22)

How do these employees get inspired about Valentine's Day in the heat of July, or Easter in February?

A big help is Hallmark's project kickoff. Card designers get together and do skits, plays, slide presentations — anything to help set the mood for the occasion.

The inspired artists then go back to a unique working environment which includes fountains, skylights and 1,400 plants. Hallmark developed this environment to study the creativity level of artists in relation to their surroundings.

"We wanted to see what makes an artist create better," Dinardo said. The experimental room is somewhat isolated. Artists have no phones to interrupt them and can make occasional phone calls from one of the few Old-English phone booths.

Because the experiment is producing positive results, eventually all of the writers and artists will be in similar surroundings, Dinardo said.

The economy has made it difficult for people to send roses, or buy candy or gifts — not only on Valentine's Day, but for Christmas and birthdays also.

To cut down on expenses, consumers will send cards, Dinardo said. And to make up for not buying a gift, consumers will buy a more expensive card, he added.

Probably each one of the 1,520 different types of Hallmark valentines will appeal to someone this year — whether poetic, graphic, frilly, conversational or comical. But all the different tastes will never blot out the unique quality of a greeting card: It is the only item always purchased to be given to someone else.

Playboy looks for Big Eight co-eds; K-State auditions start in six weeks

K-State women still have time for a crash diet before they arrive.

Representitives from Playboy magazine will be in Manhattan soon to select candidates for a photo feature, "Girls of the Big Eight," planned for the September issue.

According to David Chan, photographer in charge of the project, he and his assistant, Cheryl Snow, will be in Manhattan in about six weeks to take applications and interview candidates for the photo feature. The exact date that they will arrive is dependent on the weather.

"We'll come when it's a bit warmer," Chan said.

When they arrive in Manhattan, they will set up offices in a local hotel and run an ad in the Collegian inviting women to submit an application.

The next step for applicants will be a personal interview — the only photos taken at this time will be for identification.

Chan said the the identification photos are necessary because "the name doesn't mean anything."

Models will be selected in three categories: clothed, semi-nude and nude.

"It depends on what they want to do," Chan said.

After three or four days, Chan said that they will have enough applicants to select about six women to appear in the feature.

"The girls come from all walks of life," Chan said. The only stipulation is that they must be students at K-State.

Chan, who has been photgraphing women from other college conferences for the last five years, said that he expects "a couple hundred" applicants from K-State.

Women applying for the photo sessions tend to tell their friends they have no desire to pose for the magazine, Chan said.

"They always tell their friends that, then they just sneak over here," he said.

Chan said he believes that appearing in Playboy is "the utmost fantasy of most young girls. We always get enough to do the feature."

Women planning to apply can prepare now by having identification photos taken to bring with them to the interview, Chan said.

One other group of aspiring models should also be on the lookout for Playboy scouts. Another photographer is looking for male professors to feature in a fashion layout.

"The professors can be from any school," Chan said. Unlike the women Chan is looking for, the professors "will be dressed to the hilt."

ASK LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY delegates dealt with several resolutions this weekend in Topeka, the most important of which dealt with funding for additional campus directors. See page 7.

FUNDING FOR THE shuttle service remains uncertain as Student Senate plans to discontinue senate aid. Meanwhile, some University officials believe the services need to be expanded. See page 5.

THREE STUDENTS performed "Cop-Out" before an audience of about 50, brown-bagging it on Thursday, at the Lunchbag Theatre. The theatre is designed not only to provide lunchtime entertainment for the campus community, but to "stretch" students' directing and acting capabilities. See page 9.

Plane crash attributed to pilot error

TOKYO (AP) — The pilot of a Japanese jetliner reportedly reversed a critical thrust lever then fought off his cockpit crew just before the plane nose-dived into Tokyo Bay, Kyodo News Service said Sunday.

Twenty-four people were killed and 80 injured in Tuesday's crash of the Japan Air Lines DC-8.

Kyodo quoted the pilot, Seiji Katagiri, as saying he "didn't feel good" before flying that day.

Several Japanese newspapers said voice recordings showed the pilot acting in a strange manner during the plane's approach for a landing, at one point crying out in the cockpit.

Newspapers also said Katagiri vanished after the crash but mysteriously resurfaced later at a hotel while rescuers were still pulling bodies from the wreck.

The plane, carrying 166 passengers and a crew of eight from Fukuoka in southwest Japan, clipped several landing approach light stanchions and crashed in waist-deep water 1,000 feet short of the Handeda Airport runway.

Dart throwing hits bull's-eye in Manhattan

By SHERRY SCHMITT
Collegian Reporter

When you hear of a tournament offering $750,000 in prize money you might think of a golf tournament. But guess again. You haven't hit the bullseye until you guess "darts."

Dart throwing, a sport that is increasing in popularity, has started to make its debut in this community, according to Ty Tyson, Manhattan resident and long-time dart thrower.

Last fall a dart league was organized in Manhattan, and it currently meets two times a week — Sundays at the VFW and Thursdays at Auntie Mae's Parlor in Aggieville — said Lee Elder, senior in mathematics and president of the Mid-Kansas Darting Association. Singles tournaments are often held on Monday nights at Auntie Mae's.

Before the league had started, Auntie Mae's began hosting a Monday night dart tournament, Elder said. Because of interest, the tournaments grew in size.

"Something so more people could get involved was needed," he said. Thus, the dart league was born.

THERE ARE currently about 50 members in the league, Elder said. There is a strong potential to grow, but with Auntie Mae's — a private club — being a main host, the league can only be open to members of the club and their guests.

The game of darts is spreading everywhere. A professional dart thrower can tour and play in a tournament every weekend. Some even make a living by throwing darts, Tyson said.

Four members of the Manhattan league will participate in a regional collegiate tournament this spring, with the winner attending a national tournament.

Several universities have dart teams.

"I expect the day when there will be inner-collegiate dart competition," Tyson said. Tyson plays in many different tournaments. He helped organize the Wichita Darting Association which has about 450 members and 21 dart boards. Tyson plans to compete in the upcoming Kansas City tournament which has a $20,000 purse in addition to entry fees.

Retrieving darts ... During a Thursday night dart league, Nevin "Boomer" Markel, senior in modern language, glances back at an opponent after totaling his score in Auntie Mae's Parlor.

"We'd like to get a league started for everyone (not just members of Auntie Mae's)," Elder said. "But there's really no place big enough in Manhattan to hold several boards. It's all new to us."

ACCORDING TO John Warnica, league treasurer and senior in natural resource management, several of the players have approached the Union Program Council (UPC) about getting dart boards but have had no luck.

For a good board, one can expect to pay a retail price of at least $45, Warnica said.

The expense of the darts falls mostly on the thrower. Most throwers own their own set, he said.

"Having your own darts is kind of like owning your own bowling ball," Elder said. "They fit you and you're used to them."

A set of three darts costs anywhere from $5 to $125, Warnica said. The $5 set is made from brass and the higher quality sets are made with 90-to-95 percent tungsten, which is a denser metal.

A lot of the more serious players on the Manhattan league, own sets that cost about $65.

Crash

and Kyodo reported that investigators were focusing on possible pilot error and mental condition of the 35-year-old captain as reasons for the crash. The reports said Katagiri, who has flown DC-8s since 1970, may have reversed a thrust lever on one of his four engines, stalling the aircraft during its approach.

"I didn't feel good before flying that day," Katagiri was quoted by Kyodo as telling police investigators.

"I controlled the plane during the flight and believe I switched from automatic to manual control at an altitude of about 200 feet during my landing approach," he was quoted as saying. "After that I don't remember anything."

Katagiri refused to tell police more without a lawyer, Kyodo said.

FOUR NEWSPAPERS also reported a struggle in the cockpit involving Co-pilot Yoshifumi Ishikawa, 33, and Flight Engineer Yoshinori Ozaki, 48, when they tried to restrain Katagiri and keep the plane aloft.

Japan Broadcasting Corp. said cockpit voice tapes revealed Ishikawa shouting, "Captain, what are you doing?"

The co-pilot was quoted as telling investigators he tried but failed to pull the controls back when the plane suddenly nosedived from 200 feet. Kyodo said Ozaki "stood up to seize the captain."

Spokesmen for the Transport Ministry, Japan Air Lines and Tokyo police refused to comment on the press reports.

Speculation about Katagiri's actions was also raised by a JAL statement that he had been grounded briefly more than a year ago by a "psychosomatic disorder," and unconfirmed press reports that he had once insisted to police that his house was bugged.

Mystery also surrounded the pilot's actions after the crash.

At first, Katagiri was reported dead. Later he surfaced at a hotel near the airport and was hospitalized with unspecified internal injuries. News reports said he was too hurt to give a coherent account of what happened.

The exact nature of Katagiri's injuries and how he managed to get to the hotel without police or JAL knowing it remained unclear.

PITTSBURGH — A 9-year-old boy mauled by a cougar advertising Lincoln-Mercury cars was in stable condition Sunday, while an animal trainer faced charges of assaulting the officer who killed the cat.

The cougar attacked the youth Saturday during a car show at the David Lawrence Convention Center.

Arthur Banze, an off-duty police officer in the crowd, shot and killed the 130-pound cat as its owner, Bob Steele, struggled to get the animal to release its grip on the boy.

James Seals of Pittsburgh was taken to Allegheny General Hospital. Spokesman John Sacuto said Sunday the youngster's condition had stabilized after three hours surgery to repair cuts and damage to an artery that leads to the brain.

"The cougar just pounced on the kid, got him by the neck," said Donald Roman, a concession stand operator at the show. "You could see the blood. It was terrible."

Dawn Stader, an animal trainer who was with the cougar, was arrested after she allegedly swore at Banze and kicked him in the groin when he shot the animal, police said. Charges of aggravated assault, terroristic threats, disorderly conduct and resisting arrest were filed against Stader, police said.

AFL-CIO announces job-creation program

BAL HARBOUR, Fla. — The AFL-CIO's executive council, opening its annual midwinter meeting, is expected to demand new initiatives by the Reagan administration to put Americans back to work.

Federation President Lane Kirkland and other union leaders say the administration has dismantled programs aimed at helping those on unemployment lines at a time when joblessness is soaring to post-World War II record levels.

Unemployment — 8.5 percent last month — is expected to be a major topic when Vice President George Bush appears before the policymaking body here Tuesday.

On Sunday, the AFL-CIO's 4 million-member Building and Trades Department announced plans for a $500 million job-creation program tied to investment of union pension funds. Unemployment in the construction industry alone is twice the national average.

Couple creates legacy to memory of son

LOS ANGELES — Michael and Marsha Fuerst are hoping future generations of children will be delighted by future generations of giraffes — a legacy in memory of their 5-month-old son.

Matthew Ray Fuerst, a victim of sudden infant death syndrome, was buried seven years ago with his stuffed giraffe. This weekend, a $10,000, 10-foot-tall Masai giraffe named Mattie was donated to the Los Angeles Zoo by the Covina couple.

Zoo officials are hoping Mattie, who was obtained from a Fresno zoo, will mate with Hattie, a female at the Los Angeles Zoo, and produce offspring, possibly by 1984.

"We want to have a living memorial and something that could be enjoyed by children everywhere," Mrs. Fuerst said, adding that it took the family more than five years to save the money for the giraffe.

She said she hopes the gift will call attention to the work of the National Sudden Infant Death Syndrome Foundation (SIDS). SIDS victims, generally children under a year old, seem to be healthy but die suddenly and mysteriously in their sleep.

Man to found business using Washington's hair

The lock, purportedly cut from the presidential head for a gift, is preserved in a gold locket or breast pin surrounded by 13 tiny gold stars and pearls.

Jim Washington is asking $1 million for the locket, which is being offered for sale by Investment Matchmakers Inc. of Los Angeles.

"He won't get a million dollars. But ... I think he could get between a half-million and three-quarters of a million dollars," said Mike Greenwald, vice president of Investment Matchmakers, which specializes in unique investment opportunities.

In June 1793, Washington had a lock of his hair cut. He put it in the locket and presented it to his aide-de-camp, Col. John Trumbull, Greenwald said. Trumbull...died in 1843, willing the locket to his physician, Dr. James Washington, a first cousin of the president.

It was passed down through the family to Jim Washington, who says he is a fifth cousin of the nation's Revolutionary War leader.

"The only reason I'm interested in selling it is so I could form an insurance business," Washington told The Associated Press. "I plan to call it Washington General Insurance Co."

Playboy pictorial should be utilized

K-State will soon have the chance to show off yet another of its commodities.

Playboy Magazine is planning to feature the "Girls of the Big Eight" as a complement to its preview of the college football season in its September issue. Six women from each institution will be given the opportunity to pose for the magazine's pictorial pages.

The magazine's photographer and an assistant interviewed 175 applicants at their first stop, Oklahoma State University. The selection of the six to be included in the photo feature was made on the basis of these interviews, and a crew is to return at a later date to conduct the photographic sessions, which will take place nestled in both indoor and outdoor settings. Presumably the same procedure will be used for selecting the six K-State women in March.

Undoubtedly, segments of the University community will stage an outcry at this latest example of the degradation of women. And others will counter with examples of Playgirl Magazine's "Men of the Ivy League," or "The Men of KSU" calendar. But it should be kept firmly in mind that two wrongs don't necessarily make a right.

Nevertheless, ignoring the sexism which inherently exists in either situation, perhaps this opportunity for displaying the University should be utilized to its full potential. The magazine's feature should be viewed as a chance to show off some commodities which are more deserving of a showcase — namely the academic aspects of the University.

The pictures, afterall, will include varying degrees of dress as well as undress. And the magazine will select settings within the University community. If the proper trappings are used, the essence of the University will shine through.

Various footnotes covering the body

There are certain parts of the human anatomy that should not be taken seriously.

One extremely blatant example is the human foot. The American Heritage Dictionary's second definition states that a foot is: something resembling or suggestive of a foot in position or function, as the bottom or lowest part or the end opposite the head.

Anything positioned opposite of the head always seems to rank low. I thoroughly agree with this definition. I have seen many a mass of human bone and flesh, located opposite of the head, which only vaguely resembles or suggests a foot.

Let's face it. Feet, in general, are ugly. Any human blessed with feet that are presented to the public with pride is obviously a mutant, a biological mistake. Few of these beautifully footed humans exist. If they do, they are making a mint by doing shoe commercials.

ONE OF THE greater paradoxes in life is why the presumably "beautiful" women who model clothing have the biggest, ugliest feet ever reproduced on film. I suppose, during production, a sacrifice had to be made somewhere. After all, aren't all human beings created equal?

Women are well acquainted with the fact that feet are merely a good joke. (The Creator was in a jovial mood by the time She finished the basic design for humans. And so She thought they would enjoy a daily laugh.) This is well illustrated in women's footwear. So you thought that women wore hose to camouflage their legs? Wrong. Women love to wear those skimpy pieces of leather tacked onto three-inch heels. So, in order to wear these silly "shoes" in public, they wear hose to camouflage their feet. A study found that high-heeled shoes are the most sexually inticing form of apparel. I don't think they looked close enough.

MEN SEEM TO have a problem where their foot apparel is concerned. They are entirely too serious. Brown, black or those atrocious white shoes are viewed as the limit for the properly dressed foot. Only recently have men accepted the truth, enabling them to really wear a pair of bust-your-gut laughable shoes.

Cowboy boots are a great release for male feet. Red leather with purple eagle motifs or multi-colored checkered boots are good for the soul. Cowboy boots also make the foot appear toeless, thus more dignified.

They say there are no two human fingerprints which are exactly alike. I believe the FBI would be better off photographing criminal's toes for identification. No ten toes of any human are alike. You can peer-pressure any person into being a virtual clone but you can never take away the individuality of a toe.

TOES ARE GREAT, they are so ugly (even polished ones). There are little piggy toes that curl under the other four piggies and there are little piggies that curve outward. Little piggies that lack toenails are the ugliest ones of all. I would bet an entire Collegian paycheck (laugh track please) that Roseann Rosanna Danna loves little piggy toes.

Humans, particularly females, still make futile attempts to curb the ugliness of their feet. A barrage of items exist on the market which claim to beautify feet. Lotions to soften, chemicals to eat away dead skin, pumice stones to slough off callouses. The manufacturers should just face the facts. Feet are feet. Therefore, feet are ugly. Simple logic with which Aristotle would agree. One would have to remove the toes to truly beautify a foot and that could present a few problems.

Now, just because feet are a bit garish does not take away from their important functions in life. Without feet one would never know the joy of playing footsies. And a simple foot massage could be the beginning of something wonderful. Some individuals admit that they feel feet are extremely erotic. To each weirdo his own.

History has seen some fruitless efforts to raise the prestige of feet. The Chinese used to bind the feet of women. (Petite was in that century). However, the end product defeated (or is it de-feeted?) the initial purpose.

So, I would like to give you a hint in how to wake up and face the world if you are allergic to morning, as I am. Tomorrow morning, when you climb out of bed, sit there and contemplate your ugly feet. This should enable you to trek to the bathroom and gleefully face your face in the mirror.

Collegian rating: poor

Editor,

The Collegian fulfills an important University function and, until recently, I've put my confidence in it. In dealing through the Collegian for my senate campaign, I've become aware of negligence, grammatical incompetence and irresponsible editing.

In negligence: one business candidate, well in advance, placed and paid for an advertisement to appear in the Collegian the day before elections. The ad wasn't printed! Upon inquiry the Collegian informed the candidate that "We just didn't have room for your ad." When 26 people are running for eight positions, all publicity is essential! The Collegian should be more responsible in performing what it is paid to do.

In grammatical incompetence: another business candidate paid to have a personal printed. The name later appeared misspelled! How unprofessional! Candidates campaign to have their names recognized and remembered. It is sad when they pay for coverage and receive incorrect results!

In irresponsible editing: the Soapbox in Monday's Collegian was supposedly printed to inform the student body of candidate's views. Fine. But when poor editing misrepresents candidates, then why bother taking "limited" Collegian space to print them? As my Soapbox was carelessly edited, key phrases were omitted leaving imcomplete sentences. Thus, I appeared illiterate before the student body.

Furthermore, an important campaign strength is that I'm a Manhattan Christian College (MCC) student. I can represent nearly 200 students affiliated with both institutions. To my knowledge, no other senate applicant has this attribute. And it was completely removed from my Soapbox! MCC students taking part-time K-State courses pay K-State fees. These students have equal rights and should be equally represented. To omit this point is discriminatory to myself and to other MCC students.

In the future, I hope to see the Collegian improve because it is an important part of K-State (and MCC).

Doubt clouds funding for shuttle-car service

By BETH BAKER
Collegian Reporter

At the same time that future funding for the handicapped shuttle service is in doubt, at least one official sees a need for expansion of that service.

"The Student Governing Association (SGA) has told us they do not want to fund us anymore," said Gretchen Holden, acting coordinator for Services For Students with Physical Limitations.

"Right now my main concern is that funding for the service remain stable," Holden said.

Funding for the shuttle service falls under the jurisdiction of the University budget, according to Angela Scanlan, student body president and senior in agricultural journalism.

"Since the University is required by law to be accessible to handicapped students, senate does not feel it is their responsibility to pay for this service from the students' activity fees," Scanlan said.

UNIVERSITY OFFICIALS agreed that shuttle-service funding should be the responsiblity of the University, but are unsure where the funds will come from.

"We are hopeful that funds for the shuttle service will be obtained in next year's budget from the state," said Earl Nolting, acting vice president of Student Affairs.

"We've been working in the direction of obtaining funds from the state, but we've had tremendous fiscal difficulties."

If state funding is unavailable, SGA would be asked to reconsider funding the program, Nolting said.

The shuttle service, which is used by temporarily and permanently handicapped students to reach classes while on campus, employs one full-time driver, two part-time student drivers and has one van to transport students. Holden said the service could employ one more driver and van for peak periods in the morning.

FOR THE PAST year the shuttle service has received approximately 40 percent of the full-time driver's salary from SGA — the remaining 60 percent paid by the University. The University pays the student drivers' salaries, according to Holden.

The initial funds for the van and its hydraulic lift were provided by money left over in the Student Affairs budget, said Veryl Switzer, assistant vice president of Student Affairs.

Under the current situaton, some people may have to be turned away during peak periods of service, said to Steven Lee, program coordinator for Students for Handicapped Concerns.

In February 1979, 266 pick-ups and deliveries were made, that figure jumped to 649 in 1980, according to Holden. This has caused the shuttle service to run late when picking up and delivering students to their classes on time.

"I think we are reaching a point where we may need additional capacity for students," Holden said, "but it wouldn't necessarily have to be another van....

"We're just about at the peak of our service."

THE ADDITION of a car, or any type vehicle would satisfy the needs of the service, Holden said.

"Once you get beyond 10 students and can't get them all to class on time, what do you do°" she said.

The shuttle service is not a necessity for Janelle Edwards, junior in computer science, who is blind, but she said it saves her from bruises and uncertain moments.

"Sometimes when I know the shuttle is busy I walk to class earlier, as opposed to being late," Edwards said. "Or if it's bad enough (outdoors), I'll just get a ride earlier."

"I wouldn't be able to go to school here if it weren't for the shuttle," said Craig Perbeck, freshman in general business and handicapped student. "I'd have to go to a more accessible campus."

Concerning expansion of the service, Holden said she has not begun to pursue the possibilities of adding another vehicle and driver.

"There's a whole lot more that needs to be done to make our campus fully accessible to the handicapped student," Nolting said.

Used car buyers save by setting standards

Consumers corner

By ELIZABETH GARDNER
Contributing Writer

Thinking of getting a different set of wheels? How about buying a used car? A used car is less expensive to buy, cheaper to insure and won't depreciate in value as quickly as a new car. There are several risks to be taken in buying a used car, but these can be minimized if buyers are aware of them.

Buyers should first set their own standards for the car. Price range, size, economy, performance and equipment should be considered.

Usually, a two- or three-year-old car is the best buy in a used car. Check the odometer to see how many miles the car has been driven because federal law requires that the odometer give an accurate reading of the car's mileage. A fairly new car will still have a lot of good driving left in it, if the previous owner gave it reasonable care. The newer models are usually safer than older ones, too.

WHERE YOU BUY can be an important decision in this process. New car dealers often keep the best of the used cars that they receive in trade-ins and are usually equipped to service the cars they sell.

Used car dealers, on the other hand, offer less extensive (if any) service on the car and sometimes sell cars that are cast-offs from those taken as trade-ins by new car dealers. Beware especially of those that don't stay at one location long.

Private owners are another source of used cars. These can be found in the classified column of a newspaper. Although some cars sold this way are good cars at a good price, be careful. The car could be in worse condition than one at a reputable dealer. Ask if the car is registered, if it has ever been in an accident and why it is being sold.

BUYING A repossessed car from a bank or finance company is another alternative. In this situation, be conscious of the fact that if the previous owners were lax in making payments, they may also have been negligent in maintenance.

Car rental agencies are another option to consider. Generally, their cars have accumulated a lot of mileage in a short time, but in most cases have received good, scheduled maintenance.

After these things have been considered, give the car your inspection. Allow yourself about an hour. Take a friend along for that second set of eyes, since they may see something you don't. Go on a fair day. Rain or darkness will be a hindrance and you won't get the true physical picture of the car.

Check the interior and exterior of the car carefully. Look for rust spots under the doors, in the wheel wells and in the trunk. Also, look for blistered or peeling paint. If the color is uneven or the paint is rippled, there may have been body work done.

DON'T FORGET to check all the tires, even the spare, for uneven or excessive wear. This could show there is a mechanical problem such as a misaligned front end or defective shock absorbers or brakes.

Open and close all the doors and windows and check all of the controls. Have your friend see if the outside lights and signals are working. Also, examine the exhaust system, brakes and shock absorbers.

If the car meets your first examination, ask to take it on a test drive (with you driving). If you are refused a test drive, don't buy the car.

When you do start on a test drive, listen to the engine when it's still cold and listen for any odd sounds of knocking. Then, drive the car. The transmission should shift smoothly and the steering should be quiet and firm. Be sure to check all the gears as well as the air conditioner, heater, radio and any other features of that sort.

DRIVE THE CAR on a rough road to see how well it holds the road when going over bumps. Also, see that the car stops straight without pulling to one side or another or grabbing. Also, test to see how the car reacts when you suddenly accelerate.

If the car passes your inspection and test drive, ask to take it to a reputable mechanic. Have the mechanic check over the car and tell him anything odd that you noticed in your inspection. Ask him to look for any signs that the car may have been involved in an accident.

Even after a thorough inspection, you can still wind up with a lemon, but you will have greatly reduced the risk.

ASK assembly vetoes funding for added post

By KERRI HARTER
Asst. Government Affairs Editor

Debate over funding for an additional campus director for K-State, the University of Kansas and Wichita State University was the highlight of ASK's Spring Legislative Assembly (LA), Saturday in Topeka.

Patty Gerstenberger, KU campus director (CD), proposed the amendment to the budget, calling for an additional $90 to be allocated to the three largest regents' institutions, for the purpose of another CD on each campus.

Steve Dunn, ASK board member from KU, said, "We think that there is enough work to do on a big campus — at least at KU — to warrant two campus directors."

In opposition, Dick White, student body president at Pittsburg State University, said, "We need to utilize Legislative Assembly delegates on campus. I think we only need one paid ASK member on campus. The campus director is not solely responsible for day-to-day workings at the campus. LA delegates should remember that their job is not over after the LA. It has just begun."

ROSE KUO, KU delegate, said, "I think that first we must establish a need before we allocate funds. We need one person to effectively organize the group on a grass-roots level."

The amendment to the budget providing for an additional campus director was defeated. The budget passed without it.

Friday night, delegates broke into committees to discuss proposed resolutions which were divided into five categories: budget issues, academic issues, special constituencies, social issues and national issues. Each committee presented a report to the assembly with the description of the resolution by the author at the assembly on Saturday.

DELEGATES PASSED a resolution opposing "legislative efforts that would diminish the autonomy of the Board of Regents and the university administrations to determine where extra funds should be spent." This was prompted by the legislature's suggestion to provide funding to specfic faculty areas on campus. The sponsors of the resolution said the Regents think this would "be a dangerous precedent of legislative interference into university administration."

A resolution was also passed supporting legislation in favor of lowering residency requirements of students at state universities in Kansas from one year to six months.

Delegates passed a resolution supporting higher penalties for DWI violators. The resolution followed the guidelines of Senate Bill 716 calling for "increased penalties for conviction of 'habitual violators' for the offense of operating a motor vehicle while under the influence of intoxicating liquor."

A resolution was also passed supporting "the enactment of legislation to require the payment of interest on security deposits posted by tenants in Kansas." The rationale behind the resolution follows that of House Bill 2645 sponsored by Rep. William Brady (D-Parsons) requiring "the payment of 6 percent interest per year on the returned portion of a tenant's security deposit if the landlord owns 10 or more units."

The resignation of George Gallion, ASK administrative assistant, was also accepted. Gallion has accepted a similar position in Pennsylvania.

Darts

18-29 grams. Warnica said he prefers a thin dart which is easier for him to control and also allows the darts to land closer together.

Darts don't usually wear out, he said, but feathers occasionally have to be replaced.

"The game of darts has been growing for about three years in the Midwest," Tyson said. Other than the tournament that is held in Kansas City, Kan., the Wichita Dart Association holds two annual tournaments — a Spring Classic and a Fall Classic — each offering $10,000 in prizes.

"We've taken teams to Topeka and have done real well," Warnica said. The local league is mostly students, and the students have beaten the Topeka competition

MOST OF THE better throwers are sponsored by different companies, Tyson said. Brother's Tavern and the VFW both sponsor local teams. The big tournaments are also sponsored by companies such as Coors and Budweiser.

According to Tyson, dart tournaments are set up much like golf tournaments.

"Once you reach a certain element of skill, the game is concentration," he said. When playing for fun, Tyson said anyone could beat him, but circumstances are different in tournament play.

There are several different games that are played at tournaments, but a game called 501 is the standard national game, Tyson said.

In 501, a player plays one-on-one against a player from another team. Each person starts with 501 points and as his darts land, the score is subtracted from 501. The subtraction continues until 60 points are left, at which time, the thrower must double out. If he has 40 points, he must hit a double 20. If he has 20 points left, a double 10 must be hit and so forth until one player has no points left and thus wins.

A GAME POPULAR with the Monday night singles tournament at Auntie Mae's is Cricket. In this game, the thrower must call his shots and hit the points between 20 and 15, three times each. Other games are 301 and 801 which are both similar to 501. Team round robins are also played.

The members of the Mid-Kansas Darting Association paid $10 in dues. Dues are used as prize money. Eventually the money is split up so that everyone gets at least a little back, Elder said.

Tyson said that it is not unusual for a professional to make $1,000 in one night. In national tournaments, the first 24 places usually receive prizes.

The preliminaries for the World Cup are being held in Hawaii this year. The semi-finals will be in Australia and the finals in New Zealand. At stake in this tournament will be $750,000.

Lunchbag Theatre

Down in the depths of West Stadium, only connected to the outside by a long, umbilical hall, three students sweated out a one-act play before a critical University audience.

One student was a director, the other two actors — all three were involved in Lunchbag Theatre which presented "Cop-Out" last Thursday.

The audience of about 50 was entertained from 11:30 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. with a play that confused them, questioned their beliefs and made them think.

The play was written in 1968 by a left-wing playwright, John Guare, and concerns the death of a country — the United States.

"The government, then, was slowly killing the country by sterilization," said the director of the play, Kevin Brown, senior in theatre and journalism and mass communications. "The police and military were choking demonstrations of free speech."

FILLED WITH symbolism, "Cop-Out" used two actors to play several parts. Each part expressed something which could be taken on different levels.

"You can go as deep as you want to in this play," Brown said. "I had five pages of notes just on the meaning of it. A play like that forces me to stretch myself."

Stretching the student's directing and acting capabilities is the purpose of Lunchbag Theatre, according to Lewis Shelton, assistant professor of speech. Shelton teaches two classes, Practice in Directing and Practice in Acting. Class members are responsible for the productions put on by Lunchbag Theatre.

"It is essentially a way to give the student a chance to show what talents they've learned here," Shelton said. "It's an important culminating-type experience."

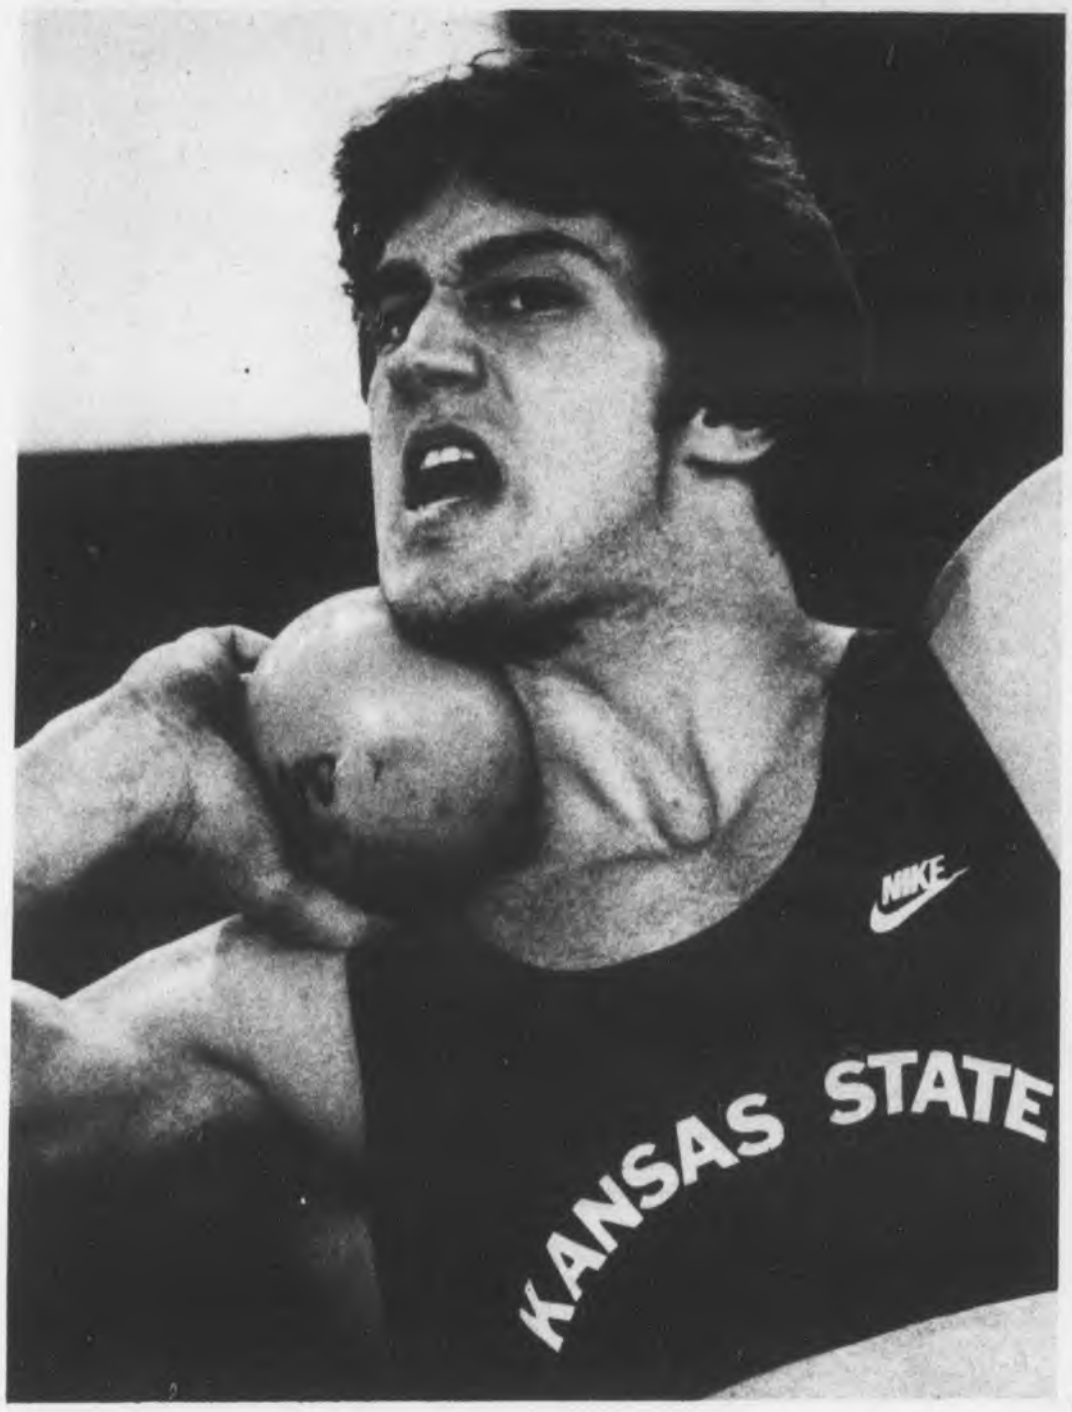
THE SENIORS AND graduate students who are in the classes have been producing the plays for six years and the enrollment of 19 this semester is a high, according to Shelton. Students are mostly in theatre, speech or the radio and television option of journalism and mass communications, although there has been participation from students across the campus.

The director-student or actor-student must be involved in two one-act plays a semester. He chooses the plays and develops the roles to be played.

"The best thing about it," Shelton said, "is that students do roles they might not ever get cast in — they can explore their range. They also learn the process of communication from actor to director."

The practice classes, which can be repeated, give the students a chance to use the things they have learned in lecture classes, Brown said.

"It's one thing to go to a lecture, but then you start to work with it and see where everything applies," he said. "The more times you do it the more you learn. Knowledge snowballs, you can really see it in theatre."



THE CLASSES do not meet on a regular basis — each student meets according to the rehearsal time for his or her ...'s. Before a play is pr... public at Lunchbag Thea ..., the classes meet to watch it and make suggestions. It is then performed for

With a look of determination... Gregg Bartlett, junior in chemical engineering, heaved the shot 55-2 at the quadrangular indoor meet Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

Men, women top Cyclones

The basketball teams traveled to Ames, Iowa, during the weekend and were twice triumphant, as both the men and women's squads defeated the Iowa State Cyclones.

In the men's game, the 'Cats were given a scare, but prevailed in the end, 58-49.

The Wildcats held a 32-30 lead at the half, but fell behind midway in the second half.

Iowa State built a six-point lead with 16:23 to play, and neither team scored until the 10:35 mark, when Tim Jankovich hit a 17-footer from the right wing. Iowa State's Malvin Warrick responded the next time down when he drove the left base line, returning the Cyclone lead to six.

The 'Cats then scored eight unanswered points. The first came from Lafayette Watkins, then Jankovich, Les Craft, and Watkins again. This flurry of points put K-State up by two points, never to trail again.

WILDCAT HEAD COACH Jack Hartman said the key to the game was a late change he made in his offense.

"I thought we steadied up at the right time — they had us down 40-34 — then we changed our offense and got better movement," Hartman said. "Our kids started playing with better poise."

Cyclone center Ron Falenschek led all scorers with 15 points. High for the 'Cats was Les Craft with 12.

K-State shot 55 percent from the field and 74 percent from the line. Iowa State shot 46.5 and 75 percent respectively.

The Cyclones dropped to 7-14 on the season, 2-8 in the Big Eight. The Wildcats upped their mark to 17-5, 7-3 in conference play.

K-State plays host to Oklahoma State Wednesday night.

IN THE WOMEN'S game earlier Saturday, K-State routed the Cyclones 72-50.

The Wildcat's took the lead early and maintained it throughout the entire game; however, the Cyclones stayed close tying the score twice in the first half but the 'Cats left the court with a five point lead, 30-25, at half.

It wasn't until 14:57 left in the second half that the 'Cats began to build their lead.

At this time, the Cyclones went for five minutes without scoring while the Wildcats added fourteen points to their score giving them a 22 point lead.

Angie Bonner started the spree by grabbing a rebound and putting it in for two points. Also helping the Wildcats during this outburst was Barbara Gilmore with eight points. Gilmore came off the bench to score a total of 11 points falling behind Priscilla Gary who led all scorers with 21 points.

The Wildcats shot 44 percent from the field and 57 percent from the line. The Cyclones lagged behind with 35 percent from the field but led from the line with 67 percent.

The Wildcats, 19-5, will host Drake Tuesday.

Shelton meets with each play cast throughout the production process.

"It is amazing how much difference it has made to perform in front of an audience," he said. "The students take it more seriously, they work harder."

Besides providing acting and directing experience, Lunchbag Theatre is an opportunity for the University to see more plays, he said.

"There aren't a lot of plays in this community and especially aren't a lot of experimental things," Shelton said.

The audience usually ranges from 50-60 persons who "come from all over."

"The audience fluctuates almost every show," Brown said. "I think it is important for students to see what other students at a university are doing. It's free, hey, eat lunch and watch a play."

Oil rig down at sea; all reported missing

ST. JOHN'S, Newfoundland (AP) — A raging North Atlantic storm toppled the giant Ocean Ranger oil rig early Monday, and officials said they feared all 84 workers aboard had perished.

They had been ordered to abandon the rig hours before it sank under wind-whipped waves 200 miles east of Newfoundland, but it was not known if all had left the rig. Only one body has been recovered.

A STATEMENT by Mobil Oil Canada Ltd. said 15 of the 84 workers were Americans, 52 were Newfoundlanders, 16 were from other parts of Canada and one was from Britain. Search and rescue officials had said earlier that at least 46 Americans were aboard the rig.

Mobil Oil Canada, which leased the rig, issued its report on the nationalities of the workers late Monday and said the names would not be released until relatives had been notified.

Pilots of search-and-rescue aircraft reported spotting bodies and debris in the 50-foot waves, but said they saw no sign of the rig, which has a deck larger than a football field.

Snow whipped by 80 mph winds battered the Ocean Ranger Sunday night, and Mobil Oil Canada Ltd. ordered workers to abandon the structure at 2:54 a.m. local time Monday (1:24 a.m. EST) when it was listing at 15 degrees.

MOBIL'S NEWFOUNDLAND operations manager, Steve Romansky, said the last message from the Ocean Ranger was received at 1:30 a.m. local time and said the workers were preparing to abandon it.

Work boats, small but powerful vessels that service oil rigs, made their way to the site and one body was recovered, search and rescue officials reported. They said three of the rig's four enclosed lifeboats were sighted, with two bodies in one and the other two empty.

Search-plane pilots, with visibility limited to about a half mile, reported they also saw two of the rig's 12 inflatable rafts, but no sign of life.

AFTER COMBING the frigid waters for hours, the planes returned to their base in St. John's and prepared to resume the search at first light Tuesday.

W.O. Mason, president of Mobil Oil Canada, told a news conference there was little hope any of the workers survived. He called the weather conditions extreme and unexpected.

Mike Clark, an Armed Forces rescue pilot who flew over the site, said: "There were a few bodies around...and lifeboats and life rafts and various debris. We searched for about two hours and (saw) various debris of the Ranger, I assume...but there was no sign of the Ranger at all."

Officials reported the rig was last sighted afloat and listing badly at 10 a.m. local time, and the pilot of the next plane saw only parts of the gear used to anchor the six-year-old Japanese-built Ranger.

THE HUGE rig, described as the world's largest, has an estimated value of $120 million, a Mobil spokesman said.

Transport Minister Jean-Luc Pepin told the House of Commons a federal investigating team was en route to Newfoundland. Energy Minister Mark Lalonde, under sharp questioning, told legislators an inspector had visited the rig within the last two weeks.

The Commons approved unanimously a motion expressing "deepest sympathy to Keep pushing... Participants in the Rock'n'Roll Jamboree, received help from various foster grandchildren during the hour-long event held at College Hills Skilled Nursing Home. The second annual event was held to raise money for the American Heart Association.

The jail's chicken-wire walls surrounded prisoners who were being held on charges such as "being too serious" and "not liking Italian food."

Outside the prison walls, College Hills Skilled Nursing Home (CHSNH) staff members skimmed around on roller skates as residents rocked (in rocking chairs) and rolled (in wheelchairs) to rousing ragtime music.

The reason for the lively scene was the second annual Rock'n'Roll Jamboree held Monday afternoon at the nursing home to benefit the American Heart Association (AHA).

Members of the sixth grade class at Marlatt School, who are foster grandchildren of the CHSNH residents, collected pledges to sponsor the jamboree, according to Donna McCallum, activities director.

"We will probably get about $1,000 in pledges," she said.

THIS YEAR, CHSNH staff members decided to have a celebrity jail, where community "celebrities" were to be held until released on bail — a donation to the AHA, McCallum said. Co-workers or relatives of the "celebrities" made

U.N. human rights official refutes estimate of deaths in El Salvador

WASHINGTON (AP) — A United Nations human rights official says political murders in El Salvador last year were about double the number the Reagan administration has cited in telling Congress that the Salvadoran junta has improved its human rights record.

Jose Antonio Pastor-Ridruejo, the U.N. Human Rights Commission's special representative on El Salvador, said a report he will submit to a U.N. meeting in Geneva later this month puts the number of assassinations at 11,000 for the first 11 months of 1981.

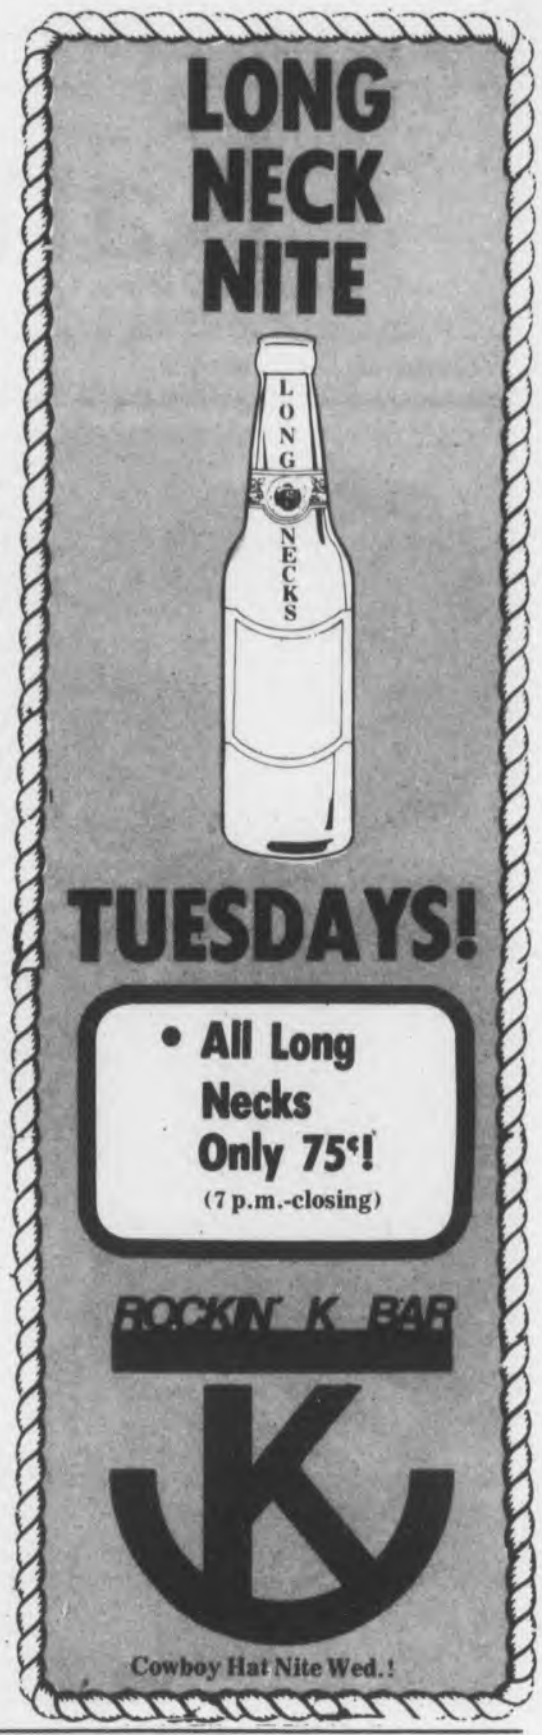
In a telephone interview from his home in Madrid, Spain, Pastor-Ridruejo said he "found that there is a consistent pattern of human rights violations in El Salvador — most violations coming from the military and rightist groups (but) some violations coming from guerrillas."

The report contradicts the administration's assertion that the number of political murders in El Salvador was cut from 9,000 in 1980 to about 6,000 in 1981.

Last month, President Reagan certified that the junta was "making a concerted and significant effort to comply with internationally recognized human rights" — a requirement that Congress demanded for El Salvador to continue to get U.S. military aid.

Administration officials cited the lower death toll, compiled by the U.S. Embassy in San Salvador, to buttress the president's claim. Most human rights groups, including Amnesty International, have challenged the administration's assertion of any human rights improvement.

Pastor-Ridruejo also contradicted a Salvadoran army spokesman who said on Feb. 3 that the army had asked the U.N. commission to send a delegation to the town of Nueva Trinidad to look into government claims that guerrillas had killed 150 to 200 civilians.



Pastor-Ridruejo said flatly that no such request was ever made, a statement supported by U.N. officials in New York. "The government of El Salvador never asked the commission anything," Pastor-Ridruejo said.

The Salvadoran government claim of the guerrilla massacre also followed American press reports of alleged massacres of hundreds of unarmed civilians by Salvadoran troops.

Elaborating on his human rights report, Pastor-Ridruejo said, "violations about life, liberty and security of peasants come most from the army and from paramilitary groups, but violations of human rights that arise from public and private property came most from guerrillas."

He said his report relied heavily on figures prepared by the legal aid office of the Roman Catholic Diocese in San Salvador. He said he was also given similar figures on political murders by Salvadoran Archbishop Rivera y Damas.

The Reagan administration has criticized the reliability of the legal aid office figures on the grounds that they do not list political murders committed by the guerrillas.

American dies in French legion crash

COSTA MESA, Calif. — Randy Lee joined the French Foreign Legion for the traditional reason — to forget — but changed his mind and twice tried to escape, his mother says. He has now been reported killed in a plane crash in East Africa.

After less than a year in the Legion, Lee, 19, was killed Feb. 3 in a plane crash with 30 other Legionnaires in Djibouti, French Somalia, his mother, Judy, said Saturday.

Judy recalled that her son had been jilted by his girlfriend and had tried everything to rid himself of her memory. Eventually he decided the only solution was to go to Europe and work out his problems at a distance.

He wound up in Paris last spring with some friends, where he met Foreign Legion recruiters in a bar, the friends told Judy.

"They offered him a lot of money, a chance to travel all over the world," she said.

Official seeks support for farm program

HUTCHINSON — The chairman of the U.S. House Agriculture Committee Monday urged farmers to go along with the Reagan administration's set-aside program.

"As bad as it may sound, go along with it because in the end it will be helpful," Rep. Kika de la Garza (D.-Texas) said at a news conference. "I would like to see you join up as minimal as it is in assistance."

De la Garza said participation should eventually help raise the price of agriculture products.

Under the administration's program, farmers must reduce 1982 acreage by 10 percent for feed grains and 15 percent for wheat to be eligible for price-support protection and special federal loans.

Musician observes 102nd birthday

BELLEVILLE — Arthritis forced Frank Jehlik to stop playing the violin at 100, but he still marked time with a conductor's baton as he turned 102 Monday.

Jehlik spends most of his time studying music at Belleview Manor nursing home, which he entered after his 99th birthday, said Carol Greene, administrator of the home. Belleville is in north-central Kansas, about 15 miles south of the Nebraska state line.

"When he came to us he said he was tired of cooking, cleaning and doing his own laundry," Greene said. "He said it was time somebody else did that."

The 1890 graduate of Belleville High School spent his life teaching music in high schools across Kansas and holding seminars for music students at colleges, Greene said.

The 74 residents of Belleview Manor, 27 of whom are over 90, helped Jehlik celebrate his 102nd birthday with Gov. John Carlin, who held a town meeting in Belleville earlier in the day.

Professor debunks potato fable

AMHERST, Mass. — Oysters, vitamin E, ground rhinoceros horn — all have been touted as aphrodisiacs. But potatoes?

George Armelagos, professor of anthropology at the University of Massachusetts, says the English used to believe just that.

"When the potato was introduced into Europe it was considered an aphrodisiac," anthropology professor George Armelagos said.

Armelagos said the plant's "tuberous" shape had something to do with the notion, but there was further evidence.

"After it became a major food crop in Ireland," he said, "the population increased at a very rapid rate, and the English took that as proof of the potato's aphrodisiac properties. They were convinced that eating the potato was increasing the sexual activity of the Irish."

Actually, he explained, the Irish had just suffered through a series of famines and were finally just better fed, so more children survived.

Shoppers fight for bargains at sale

COHOES, N.Y. — Battalions of sale-crazed shoppers laid siege to a discount store in this aging textile-mill city Monday, engaging other bargain hunters in hand-to-hand combat after the doors opened for a Washington's Birthday sale.

"It's total chaos. There's women fighting with each other, women grabbing the same handbags and belting each other," said Police Sgt. Jim Young, who was standing duty at Cohoes Specialty Stores Ltd.

The excitement was stirred by leather blouson jackets by Kenar for $79 ("nationally advertised at $290"), Capraro dresses for $23 (down from $238), and $11 Halston metallic handbags, once $150-$170, among other sale items.

Hundreds of women and a few men, looking out of place, began to queue up in the cold before dawn. By the end of the day bargain hunters were expected to have doubled the population of this city of 19,000 north of Albany where the Hudson and Mohawk rivers meet.

Volunteer efforts produce elections

President Reagan has included in his political plan for rehabilitating American a call for increased volunteerism — a call that may be the only plausible point made during the first half of his term.

Americans have a peculiar penchant for volunteerism, whether it be coaching the neighborhood softball team or aiding the Red Cross Bloodmobiles. The degree varies but it exists at all levels, including the academic level.

The political system, which serves to elect our presidents and other leaders, is one of the more complex and intriguing systems which are generated by and dependent upon volunteers.

The political system of K-State is equally, if not more, dependent on the time each student devotes to generating interest and carrying out the process of elections. All campaign workers share in the victory of candidates. The losing efforts should gain satisfaction from time given and knowledge earned in the process.

Poll workers and election officials deserve a round of applause for molding the process into results. Although their work is not completed, an often unacknowledged appreciation of their efforts lies in the back of each voter's mind.

While some decry that members of the student government are merely seeking titles to fill a resume, no student submits the weekly hours to University affairs without owning a degree of the ingredients that creates volunteerism.

If volunteerism was the only point necessary to complete Reagan's budget balancing then the economic woes of the American people would appear conquerable.

Playboy is degrading

Editor,

Well, Deanna, let me be one of the first to "outcry" not only against Playboy magazine but also your ridiculous and inconsistant editorial. Monday's editorial in the Collegian colors Playboy's intent to feature naked (not nude; there is a difference) K-State coeds as a great promotion for the university.

This ignorant way of viewing this exploitation is ludicrous. Why don't we simply feature "T and A" in university catalogues, bulletins and letter heads if that is all K-State has to promote? Even you say it is "wrong" in your editorial but still condone it. Am I to understand that the Collegian, the voice of the university, is openly approving of something it says is wrong?

I can only hope K-State will be sensible enough to not participate in this humiliating "promotion." We can do better than that.

A home for the soul

There's a place I call home; more than my room filled with papers and pictures of Mom and Dad, more than the cluttered mess of the newsroom, more than the walks of campus where students pound away their learning lives.

This place haunts me in class as the teacher drones on about people and places in times long ago. It interrupts my thoughts while taking a test or writing a story. I dream about it when conversations get long and speeches become boring.

Tuttle draws me and pulls me like a magnet away from classes, people and things I should be doing. The wide expanse of water calls to me until my eyes cloud over with the vision of serene, rippling waves mirroring a large sky punctured by hawks surveying their domain.

It doesn't take much to get me to Tuttle. Almost everytime I drive thoughts of Tuttle turn my wheels left instead of right and I'm on Tuttle Creek Boulevard going toward the waters of the lake.

TUTTLE HAS BURNED itself in my soul and when I turn the corner that leaves my worries in Manhattan, the soaring expectation of peace lifts my spirit and soothes the hurts of the world.

If serenity can be found, it is where the Flint Hills tumble down into the green waters of the immense lake. Deep in its depths, the unwanted things of the world are drowned and replaced by dreams, memories and stillness.

Dreams are the times when I sit on a cracked boulder and stare at the waves thinking of faraway places and things I will do when time allows and freedom permits. Places where stark, granite mountains beckon to the packer who knows the trails untraveled leading to views hidden behind tall lodgewood spires. Places where foreign-sounding voices pierce the air and strange noises from different lands fill my ears.

MEMORIES ARE THE times when I skip rocks on the beach, making ripples in the glittering gold path that leads to the setting sun. Memories of laughter filling my convertible and sunlight touching greased, coconut-smelling bodies. Memories of huddled sleeping bags shivering around the dying embers of a fire, which was made the night before with friends who had no intention of spending the night on the sands of Tuttle.

Stillness is a walk in the winter as eerie sounds of ice popping remind me of times in the past when I have wondered about the future. Stillness is the bald eagle that soared to heights I have only dreamed of and carried my wishes to the sky.

I GO TO Tuttle when I hurt. I cry and pour my feelings into a lake that doesn't stammer and say "I'm sorry." It only touches the rocks with a gentle wave that has made the same quieting sound for years older than me.

I go to Tuttle when I laugh. I smile and scream at the sun with the bounding joy of a little child. No one smirks at my antics and no one whispers about my silliness. The lake only returns my joy with that same gentle wave.

And last, I go to Tuttle when I'm lonely. As I walk the rocks along the dam, hike the hills under a half-crescent moon or sit and feel the breeze feather my face, I am convinced that somehow I'm not really alone at all.

pledges by phone or in person to either release the celebrities or lengthen their prison term.

"I don't care at all about how much money we make. The main reason we're doing this (the jamboree) is not the money," McCallum said. "We do it because it makes them (the residents) feel good about themselves — like they're giving something to society instead of always receiving."

LAST YEAR the Rock'n'Roll Jamboree raised "just shy of $500," Brian Warren, CHSNH administrator, said.

The jamboree allows the elderly to participate in raising money for a "good organization," Warren said. "We tried this jail aspect to promote some celebrities. It's a good way to solicit funds and get the community involved."

Warren said he credits the majority of the jamboree's success to the Marlatt School foster grandchildren.

"If we didn't have those children here, the whole program would fall apart. They do a super job," he said as he watched the sixth-graders push the residents' wheelchairs and talk with those who were rocking.

"We have foster grandparents and come here every month," Matt Laurie, sixth-grader from Marlatt School, said. "We stay for about a half an hour, roll them around in their chairs, play games. They get real happy. We talk about school or how it used to be — the old times."

"Our local division of the heart association has a state-approved budget that we ask for a year in advance," Gardner said.

The local AHA division draws on the state's budget for its money-making projects, he said. The money made from the local division's fund-raising projects goes back to the state AHA fund.

"We try to preserve the money in our budget to use for research," Gardner said. "There is only one paid staff person, in Salina, who services us and handles 22 counties. All the rest of the activities in the community are done purely by volunteers.

"It is interesting to know that Manhattan receives more money, in reality, from the national heart fund than we contribute to it. A number of researchers (in Manhattan) have been given grants," he said. "I don't mean to sound degrading to the community at all — I just think people should be aware of the fact that we benefit from it (AHA) as a community. It can get people jobs and have them working."

A CHSNH resident, Bernice Marie Bishop, said she participated in the jamboree "to have fun." She chose not to rock during the event because she said she'd "rather be in a wheelchair — rolling."

Another Manhattan nursing home, Wharton Manor, also held a Rock'n'Roll Jamboree. According to Mary Joy, licensed practical nurse at Wharton Manor, the jamboree, held Sunday, "collected $157.07, but is still collecting" donations for the AHA.

Livestock show gives experience in showmanship

Preparations are being made for the 56th annual Little American Royal to be held April 3 in Weber Arena.

The Little American Royal (LAR) is for any K-State student interested in gaining hands-on experience in showmanship, according to Pam Van Horn, senior in animal science and executive secretary for the show.

Students make three choices from among beef, dairy, swine, sheep and horse categories in which they wish to participate.

The LAR executive committee will make a random drawing on March 4 to determine the type of livestock the student will show.

"No student is guaranteed their first choice, but is assured one of their choices," Van Horn said.

When the selection has been made, the students will be able to spend approximately one month with the animal preparing for the show.

The responsibility of the student will be to "fit" the animal for the show which includes bathing and trimming the animal.

A reserve and grand champion will be awarded along with the top five placings in each division, Van Horn said.

Advisers will be available in each of the livestock areas to answer questions and teach those unfamiliar with showing an animal.

Sign-ups are continuing until 4 p.m. Wednesday in both Weber and Call halls.

A collection of fruit... Over 40 citrus-crate labels from Hal Moldauer's collection are on display through Wednesday in the Union Courtyard.

Collector exhibits, sells original citrus crate labels

By PETE MANFREDO
Collegian Reporter

If stamp collecting isn't exciting anymore and coin collecting just doesn't cut it, maybe you should try citrus-crate labels. Hal Moldauer does. He now has more than 2,000 labels from 250 brands of citrus fruits.

A selection of more than 40 original California citrus-crate labels will be on display through Wednesday in the Union Courtyard. The small, brightly-colored prints are original lithographs dating from approximately 1920-1945.

Moldauer, a K-State graduate in architecture and computer science, started collecting labels as a hobby after he saw the labels in a graphics magazine article. After purchasing 15 labels for $15.95, Moldauer was on his way.

According to the collecter, the labels have an interesting history. As the citrus industry began to expand in the early 1900s, the growers in California found they needed special labeling methods to identify specific

Leonard beats Finch in third round TKO

RENO, Nev. (AP) — Sugar Ray Leonard battered Bruce Finch to the canvas three times and stopped him in the third round Monday night to retain the undisputed welterweight boxing championship of the world.

Leonard completely dominated this mountain gambling resort's first title fight in 72 years. The bout was billed as "Reno's Got It," but Reno had it for less than nine minutes as Leonard completely outclassed Finch.

About midway in the second round, Finch pinned Leonard in a neutral corner and landed several punches to the head and body while missing many others. Suddenly, Leonard pounded three savage hooks to the body and a crisp right to the jaw that sent Finch staggering across the ring. Leonard leaped to the attack and landed a fusillade of head punches, climaxed by a right that dropped Finch.

FINCH STRUGGLED up at the count of eight and went down a short while later from another flurry to the head. Again he struggled up and managed to last out the round, although he reeled about the ring like a drunk.

Then, in the third round, Finch seemed to be boxing well when Leonard suddenly unleashed a left hook that traveled just a few inches to the challenger's jaw. Down went Finch on his hands and knees. He struggled up at eight, wobbled back against the ropes and referee Mills Lane signaled the fight was over at 1:50 of the round.

At a prefight press conference, Leonard had told Finch, "I'll give you an opportunity to fight for the title, not to win it."

FINCH NEVER had a chance.

The 27-year-old Finch is called "Lightnin," but on this night, Leonard packed all the thunder.

The two men had met each other as amateurs nine years ago, with Leonard winning a three-round decision.

"I'm a much better fighter than I was when I was an amateur," Finch said. But he is not in Leonard's class. And with money on the line, he couldn't last three full rounds.

It was Leonard's first defense of the undisputed title he won Sept. 16 when he stopped Thomas Hearns in the 14th round at Las Vegas. The easy victory was his 32nd against a single loss to Roberto Duran, which Leonard avenged in New Orleans on Nov. 25, 1980.

Midcourt shot means money in the basket

Students attending the next three home women's basketball games will have the chance to win up to $1,000.

The Kansas State Student Foundation is sponsoring a basketball midcourt event which will take place either during halftime or immediately following the game, Mary Wiklander, assistant director of the KSU Foundation, said.

Each student participating will have the chance to shoot the basketball from the midcourt line. Participants making one basket will win $5, $25 for two and $1,000 for three consecutive baskets,

This event is open to any K-State student who has never participated in a college varsity sport or professional athletics. It will be held at the women's games against Drake University, Creighton University and the University of Kansas, Wiklander said.

This event was developed by the Student Foundation to serve three purposes, Wiklander said.

The first is promotional. "It will assist in establishing our name," she said. The foundation was formed in September and is the student branch of the KSU Foundation.

The second purpose is to promote greater interest and attendance at women's basketball games. "We are trying to help the women's basketball team, Wiklander said. "It is an incentive to try and bring people out."

Tickets may be purchased at the door or at the KSU Foundation for $1. The Wildcats will host Drake University tonight at 7:30.

Drake jeopardizes 'Cats' consecutive win-streak

After a successful road trip, the women's basketball team will return home tonight to play Drake University. The Wildcats defeated Creighton, 79-49, and Iowa State, 72-50, to bring their record to 19-5.

K-State has now won 10 games in a row, one shy of the all-time mark. The 1968-69 women's basketball team put together 11 consecutive wins for the record that is now in jeopardy.

The Bulldogs will also be vying for their 20th win. Drake, coached by Carole Baumgarten, has won seven in a row and 12 out of its last 13 games. Their last loss was to the third- ranked women's team in the nation, Old Dominion.

K-State's Head Coach Lynn Hickey commented on the Drake squad.

"They are a lot bigger," Hickey said. "They are the best offensive team we will play all year. They don't have great speed, but they are physical and powerful."

Drake averages 53 percent from the field in the second half of its games. Overall, the Bulldogs shoot 48 percent from the field.

Sophomore center Lorri Bauman, who scores 21 points a games, leads Drake in scoring. Three other starters also score in double figures for the Bulldogs.

Hickey also said her team will need to shoot well to come out on top.

"It might be a shooting duel between the teams. They are two very good offensive teams, so the team that plays the most aggressive defense will win the game," Hickey said.

K-State is shooting approximately 50 percent from the field and outscoring the opposition by more than 10 points each time out on the court.

Priscilla Gary is leading the 'Cats in scoring with 18 points per game. Tammie Romstad is scoring 16 points per game.

K-State has the lead in the all-time series with Drake, 4-2. The Bulldogs, however, won the two encounters a year ago, by scores of 94-74 and 76-69.

The second loss ended K-State's chances of gaining entrance to post-season competition.

Shelley Hughes led the Wildcats in the two contests scoring 33 points and grabbing 21 rebounds. Jean Roise scored a career-high 27 points in the second loss to the Bulldogs.

Susan B. Anthony birthday party highlights women's cultural week

Susan B. Anthony is not only honored on a coin, but also is receiving special recognition from the Women's Resource Center's (WRC).

In celebration of Anthony's birthday, WRC is sponsoring the Susan B. Anthony Cultural Week, which began Monday and ends Friday.

For the past four years the WRC has sponsored a birthday party and Women's Fair, but this year it has expanded the celebration to a week of activities which depict different areas of women's culture.

The activities began Monday with the Women's Fair. More than 20 campus and community women's groups had information tables set up in the Union.

WRC sponsored a birthday party in honor of Susan B. Anthony Monday night at the Manhattan Women's Club.

"Everything is off to a good start," Caroline Peine, WRC director, said.

At noon today, Kate Anderson, assistant professor of speech, will speak on "A Women's Perspective," in Union 205.

The program, "Music in a Growing Women's Culture," will be presented at noon Wednesday in Union 203. The program will cover the topic of women's music composers and why women's music is written the way it is, according to Shelly Crosby, WRC graduate assistant and program coordinator for Women's Culture Week.

"Women's music is from the heart," Crosby said. "It isn't done for profit like most of the popular songs are."

On Thursday, a program about women's art will be from 11 a.m. to noon in the Union Courtyard. Quilts will be displayed along with various examples of quilting techniques. Until recently, Crosby said, quilts have not been recognized as an art.

Women's literature in academic and non-academic settings will be the subject of Friday's program. Phyllis Bixler, assistant professor of English, and University For Man (UFM) reading group speakers, will present the program at noon in Union Stateroom 3.

For the conclusion of Susan B. Anthony Cultural Week, Crosby said WRC will sponsor a coffee house program at the UFM Fireplace Room from 8 to 11 p.m. Friday.

The reason why Susan B. Anthony is being honored this week is because she is considered to be one of the best-remembered "feminists" and "is often the one looked to as an mentor," Crosby said.

ORIGINALLY, THE MARK was branded into the end of the wooden crate. This became time-consuming and paper labels were developed. Moldauer said more than 300 packing houses existed in the 1920s and '30s, each with several labels.

Schmidt and Western were two of the largest lithographic houses in California. With the help of sketch artists, an art director and lettering specialists, the house was able to produce enough new crate designs to keep up with the demand. The team approach, however, almost always leaves the label art anonymous.

The first labels, done in soft colors, were of children, flowers and nondescript landscapes. In 1918, it was discovered that shoppers could not recall brand names. Brighter colors and creative designs supplanted the previous labels to create a lasting impression on the wholesalers. Many of the designs, such as a unicorn, had little to do with the product.

MOLDAUER SAID that after reaching a peak in the 1930s, the labels declined in use during the '40s and faded out in 1956. The downfall of labels is attributed to the invention of the corrogated cardboard carton. Unused labels were shoved into drawers of printers and packing houses along the California coast. During the early 1970s about four people sought and acquired 90 percent of the labels.

Moldauer's personal collection, numbered among the largest in th world, has been on display throughout the Midwest for the past few years. All the labels exhibited and sold are from the original printing, generally from 1920-1935.

The price of the labels ranges from $9.50 for the common types such as Royal Knight, to $28.50 for Airship and $33.50 for California Dream, a relatively rare design. The exhibit, sponsored by the Union Program Council Arts Committee, can be viewed from 10 a.m. to 7 p.m.

I WAS THERE

by John Markiewicz

Reference is made to the Collegian's February 11th, 1982 issue.

I address the Muslim Students Association who refer to the U.S. Government as western imperialists.

I lived and worked in your "oppressed" country for 2 years, 3 months, until January, 1979. I was proud to be part of the 200-man American construction team, charged with the building of one of Iran's largest industrial complexes: the 40,000 metric ton per day Sar Cheshmeh copper mine at Rafsanjan. The difficult part of the assignment was to meet schedules, while training and building with an unskilled workforce of 5,000 Iranians.

A permanent camp was built to house, feed, and clothe those hardy mountain men. For many, it was their first time to sleep on warm beds, instead of their familiar dirt floors at Cave City. Three meals a day vanished quickly, and to be provided with new work boots . . . but the thing they sought most was a job in which they could learn a skill and earn rials to buy goods. This is what the Shah was trying to achieve—a skilled work force so Iran could compete in the industrialized world. But, Muslim students, this takes decades of time and "imperialism." The job was especially tough during the winter months, trying to get food, fuel, and materials up to the 8,000 foot mountain pass. Even so, the Americans,—excuse me—"western imperialists," worked 70-84 hours a week training your people.

I witnessed many such projects.

The business community of Iran, under the stable political conditions of the Shahanshah, saw phenomenal economic growth. The economic development led to an increase in the money supply and a rise in the purchasing power of your people. The oil revenues enabled your government to spend large sums on road building, irrigation, and communications for your people. And from there, a capital market was raised, helping develop the home industry, hospitals, schools, farming, etc. Many consumer goods, which were luxuries for you well-to-do, were now demanded by the majority. Let me re-educate you on the Shahanshah's peaceful revolution. In less than 20 years, he brought your undeveloped country up to 20th century standards, and would have placed Iran in the world economys Big Seven within the next ten years, had he lived. He abolished the peasant-landlord system. He nationalized all water and forest resources for the purpose of conservation, proper management, and better utilization. He promoted profit-sharing arrangements between industrial workers and management. He formed the education corps to teach in the rural areas. He formed the health corps to bring medical attention to the distant villages. Construction projects were so numerous, that your country was known as one big building yard. Your steel mills produced Iranian plate for the local manufacture of Iranian cars. Tourism flourished—all within 20 years. The Shah's biggest mistake was trying to change a country overnight in a world arena that has no rules.

Under Iman Khomeini, your economy has now collapsed, your women are being returned to the rug looms, and many go hungry. Old people die from exposure to the cold, since fuel is in short supply. Moslems are executing Moslems.

Muslim students—I was there when your people burned alive 377 men, women and children in the Downtown Cinema Rex in Abadan on August 21, 1978. Your religious extremists believed that the people should have been in the prayer mosques, instead of a movie theatre. Did your God approve of this? How many of you attend movies here?

Muslim students—why did your people attack American workers at Bell Helicopter International in Isfahan by bombing their bus. The 12,000 Americans in Isfahan were engaged in defense-related projects (The Cobra Gunship Programme). Aimed at strengthening Iran. Was this imperialism?

Muslim students—why did your revolutionaries butcher my friend and co-worker, Marty Berkowitz, at his home in Kerman in January, 1979? They said he was a spy, because he was a retired USAF colonel. They said he was Jewish, because his name was spelled "witz." His widowed wife and children will never understand. Where in your Holy Book, The Koran, does it give permission for Moslems to oppress and kill Jews? You must know; your article states "Down with international Zionism." Where does the Koran give Khomeini the right to execute thousands of brother Moslems?

Muslim students—I write this in memory of my friend, Marty. So let me remind you of what the western educated Iranian never failed to remind us—we were Guests in Iran, and had absolutely no rights.

Muslim students—fortunately for you, you have rights here on U.S. soil. It's the "imperialist" U.S. government that has saved your hides from Iman Khomeini. It's the "imperialist west" that allows you to attend an institute of higher education. It's the "imperialists" that allow you to hand out anti-U.S. literature on a campus. It's we "imperialists" who allow you to set up tables in the Union to support a man that held 52 Americans hostage. Only in America can this happen.

Muslim students—You, too, are Guests here. Don't abuse a privilege that is the dream of many. Remember this: the vast majority around you love this country and her flag, respect their government and president, believe in freedom of religion, and cherish their liberties on campus.

If you are pro Khomeini, and anti-U.S. government, then GO HOME. That plane flies both ways, and I'm sure the Iman would welcome you back to the chaos of civil war, and eventually lead you into the paws of the Red Giant.

Outward Bound: Students respond to lure of the wild, sign up for wilderness survival trip

By PETE MANFREDO
Collegian Reporter

The cry of "outward bound" was used by sailors for hundreds of years for that moment when the anchor is weighed and the vessel is committed to the risks of the open sea.

Like these sailors, K-State students will be presented with a challenge and an opportunity for adventure. During spring intersession, 15 students will participate in the Colorado Outward Bound School.

According to Fred Newton, associate professor of student developmemt and an Outward Bound group leader, the students will travel to Colorado to subject themselves to one of the greatest challenges available — survival in the wilderness.

"Outward Bound offers physical and mental challenge," Newton said. "Too often we don't step out and step back from our daily routines and see what we can really do."

THE K-STATE GROUP, along with 18 students from Texas A&M University, will spend 12 days hiking and experiencing the outdoors in the Colorado Rockies, Newton said.

Outward Bound furnishes the major supplies, like ponchos and tents. The student only needs to bring personal things, such as clothes and hiking boots.

"When we get there we will be split up into groups of 11-13 students and two guides," Newton said. "The guides give you training that ranges from basic first aid and how to handle hypothermia to backpacking skills and decision-making."

According to Newton, all the activites will be introduced gradually so the student will have time to learn the skills needed to live and travel safely in the wilderness. Newton recommends getting in shape before heading for the mountains.

The student does not have to be a mountaineer or especially athletic to participate in the course, Newton said. "The instructors pick up the level of the group at the beginning and work from there."

ACTIVITIES THE GROUP will encounter include cross-country skiing, rock climbing, rapelling, a gorge crossing, hiking and a peak climb up Mount Elbert, about 50 miles west of Denver.

"There may even be a 10-mile run at the end," Newton said.

Outward Bound is a nationwide organization with schools in Minnesota, New Mexico, North Carolina and Colorado. College credit for the course is available through the Department of Continuing Education.

Newton, who worked on a similar project at Duke University, said this is the first time the course is being offered at K-State. It will be a pass/fail course and the students will be required to keep a log and write a paper on their experiences. The course can also be taken on a no-credit basis through Continuing Education or directly through the Outward Bound School.

"This is a test run based on response and the reaction of people that go," Newton said. "We might make it a yearly thing."

ACCORDING TO NEWTON, constant learning and personal development is the key to the school's success.

"You learn to deal with yourself and others under the basic limitations of cooking food and having to exist with the elements," Newton said. "It lets you deal with another aspect of yourself that you may have never known existed."

People who have completed the course "found that they learned more about themselves that influenced them later on," Newton said.

Julie Winters, junior in natural resource management, is an alumna and student representative of the Colorado school.

"Outward Bound doesn't change you, but what you learn from the course will," she said.

"I learned a lot about myself, a lot of outdoor skills, and I got closer to God on the trip," Winters said. "The mountains are not benevolent in any way, you have to earn your right to be there."

WINTERS SAID the group's experience was very rewarding.

"There were times when I had to trust people when I never thought I could," she said. "It brought out every emotion I have."

Winters had no contact with the outside world during her trip.

"I didn't know about the Hyatt Regency disaster or Prince Charles and Lady Diana," she said. "When I came back I thought 'Wow, I missed a lot,' but then I thought, 'but I did so much more.

"The first time I went was one big surprise the whole time," Winters said. "I'd go again now that I know everything I'd be getting into."

CLIFFORD SCHUETTE, associate professor of student development and an Outward Bound group leader, also supports the program.

"People learn a sense of challenge," Schuette said. "It (Outward Bound) pushes you to limits you didn't think you could achieve. Most things we do in everyday life doesn't challenge us.

"My goal in the course is to achieve greater self-reliance and self-responsibility," he said.

Schuette, who has worked with other projects utilizing the same concepts, said the best part was realizing he had greater potential and putting it to use in other things.

According to Newton, the cost of the entire trip, including transportation, is $400. If a student were to go on his own it would cost $500, plus transportation, Newton added.

Nine hours after the order to abandon, Mobil said the anchors and buoys had been sighted, but the rig was not found. Spokesman Ed Bonnell later said the company had not drawn the conclusion the Ocean Ranger had sunk.

A SEARCH AND RESCUE spokesman in Halifax, Nova Scotia, said the type of life raft used by the rig was designed so survivors could live for several hours even if the raft was upside down in the water. The rig reportedly carried survival suits said to help keep a wearer alive for about an hour.

A spokesman for the rig owners — Ocean Drilling and Exploration Co. of New Orleans, La. — said earlier that of the 84, 10 Americans and 25 Canadians were employees of the owners. The spokesman, Al Spindler, said the remainder of the crew were service hands employed by subcontracting firms.

Meat leftovers serve as everyday essentials

Cattle, hog, sheep by-products aid consumers

By JANE RAMSBOTTOM
Collegian Reporter

What do glass, rubber, cement and cosmetics have in common with pork chops, ham and bacon? What do buttons, marshmallows, candles and insulation have in common with hamburger, beef steaks and a sirloin? Or better yet, how do photographic film, violin strings and soap relate to lamb chops and leg of lamb?

The answers respectively: hogs, cattle and sheep. If you're confused, don't feel alone, because many other consumers confronted with the same questions would find it just as difficult to determine the correlations.

You could probably identify immediately with the red meat mentioned because for many, it is a familiar part of daily food consumption. What you might have been puzzled with were the common products which are also by-products of the same sources.

IT'S HARD TO imagine that glass and bacon both come from a hog. Or that the hamburger you ate for lunch possibly came from the same animal as the button on your shirt. The livestock industry plays a very important role in the economy today. Even vegetarians who detest red meat consumption might be surprised to learn that many of the everyday essential items that they use are by-products of the red meat industry, according to David Schafer, associate professor of extension animal science.

Approximate percentages of usable by-products from livestock are: hogs, 12.9; cattle, 9.5; and sheep, 14.8, said Clifford Spaeth, assistant professor of extension animal science. These figures have an economic importance to the consumer because when the carcass can be conserved for by-products as well as red meat, the producer can deliver the red meat at a lower cost to the consumer, Spaeth said.

Man could not survive without the aid of the livestock industry and not just because of its use as a food source. The life-supporting devices as well as essential products used to help make life more convenient are provided by the industry, Schafer said.

ANIMAL BY-PRODUCTS accommodate our needs in life not only for the basic means for survival, but for pleasure as well. The serosa layer of the small intestine, for instance, is used to manufacture tennis racquet strings, Schafer expalained.

Almost everyone is aware that hide is used to produce sports equipment such as footballs. Without that contribution, there might not have been the "creation" of the Super Bowl, Schafer said.

"By-products have been used for centuries," said Michael Dikeman, professor of animal science. Just within the last 50 to 75 years by-products have commercially been used to their maximum, he added.

Most edible by-products are saved while the remaining inedible by-products go to rendering. National By-Products, Liberal, comes to K-State twice a week to pick up most of the inedible by-products which are used in feeds.

The biology department utilizes some of the blood for research, Dikeman said.

BY-PRODUCTS OFFER many advantages to the consumer, particularly in the areas of pharmaceuticals and industrial products.

Animal tallow (fat) is used in producing industrial oils and lubricants, cosmetics and soap. Pigskin is used not only for severe burn victims and leather for apparel and accessories, but also as a gelatin for capsule and photographic film, Schafer said.

The dog has traditionally been considered man's best friend, but if it were not for the dog's steadfast companionship, the hog could have easily fulfilled that role.

In fact, the hog is actually more of a friend in some respects because of some of the by-products it contributes to the preservation of many hundreds of lives.

The hog plays an essential role in the lives of humans, providing such things as insulin for treating diabetics and heart valves used to replace damaged or diseased human heart valves. Pigskin is used to treat severe burn victims as well as to make durable garments, handbags and other accesories, according to Schafer.

THE EXPRESSION that man uses "every part of the hog except the squeal" is no exaggeration since the hog's carcass is so well utilized for a variety of purposes.

Hog blood is used as a leather-treating agent for fabric printing and dyeing and as a sticking agent. Bones and skin are used for glue and for pigskin garments, gloves and shoes. Dried bones are use for buttons and bone china. Hair is used for artist's brushes, insulation and upholstery, Schafer said.

In addition, "miniature hogs" are being used frequently in laboratories for human research because of their similarity in pulmonary, cardiac, dental and prenatal brain development.

Good things come from cattle besides beef. In fact, a 1,000- pound steer yields an estimated 432 pounds of beef. The remainder of the weight is used for by-products, both edible and inedible, such as foods, pharmaceuticals, clothing and cosmetics.

Fetal calf blood is used for cancer research. Intestines are use for medical sutures, and the brain is not only used for cancer research, but also as a source of

Ambassador criticizes U.N., rates it 'very dismal show'

WASHINGTON (AP) — The United Nations is "a very dismal show" in which conflicts are worsened rather than resolved, U.S. Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick charged Monday.

She told 225 leaders of the American Legion on Monday that some U.N. agencies, including its refugee commission, the World Health Organization and its meteorological service, do "very positive things which we would all be happy to contribute to."

But she added, "If we look at what happens in New York out in the Security Council and in the General Assembly, then I guess I believe it is a very dismal show. And what is worse, its effect, I think, is almost precisely the opposite of the intentions of the founders of the United Nations...above all to assist in conflict resolution."

"What we find instead is that conflicts, rather than being resolved there are in fact polarized, extended and exacerbated. They are much harder to solve rather than easier to solve, generally speaking," she said.

The Reagan administration's U.N. ambassador made the criticisms in response to a question from a Legin member who asked if it was "worth $5 million a day for our one vote against the world."

After criticizing the General Assembly and Security Council, she concluded: "It's a very serious problem. That's not the sort of activity we want in fact to underwrite."

It was not the first time that. Kirkpatrick, a former college professor, has leveled sharp criticism at the international forum where she has served for the past year. She said last April 29, "the United Nations sometimes becomes part of the problem instead of solving the problem."

In her speech to the American Legion's Foreign Relations and National Security Commissions,. Kirkpatrick sharply criticized the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua and defended U.S. support of right-wing regimes. She also criticized liberals who see cause for optimism in Marxist guerrilla movements.

"From the perspective of the United States, the most significant difference between the dictatorship of Anastasio Somoza and the dictatorship of the Sandinistas is that one was friendly toward the United States and one has a line in its national anthem that we, the United States, are the enemies of mankind."

She said the left-wing Sandinista government since overthrowing Somoza in July 1979 has stifled freedom and made "a great many moves" to join "the global Soviet military machine."

She declined comment afterwards on a Washington Post report that the Reagan administration is encouraging political and paramilitary operations by other governments against the Cuban presence in Nicaragua.

She also said she believes the government in El Salvador is "doing the best it can" to protect human rights.

Lectures focus on armament issue; speakers to evaluate arms control

By KAY HUNTER
Collegian Reporter

Few people understand the balance of military powers and the decision-making process that affects that balance. A man who is informed about international negotiations will speak at 7:30 tonight in Union Forum Hall.

"I want to make a small plea for sympathy for the president and for the administration making the decisions because our knowledge is less than perfect and the risk for error may be fatal to our nation," said Paul Cook, special assistant for the U.S. State Department's Bureau of Intelligence.

The Lou Douglas Lecture Series, featuring Cook, who will speak on "Arms Control and U.S.-Soviet Relations," are a series of programs sponsored by the University for Man, focusing on a different issue each year. The series is named in honor of Lou Douglas, former professor of political science. The topic of this year's lectures is "Arms Control and Survival."

The possibility of a meeting between Reagan and Leonid Brezhnev, Soviet secretary general, is not likely at the present time, according to Cook.

"If the situation in Poland eases and the Soviets in Geneva begin to come off their high horses, then there would be utility in the two principals meeting," Cook said.

"One thing we don't want to do is have a meeting where the two sides exacerbate and go away mad."

Communications in general between Washington, the Soviet embassy and Moscow presently are strained, but improving, according to Cook.

"We have ease of access, but the contacts are purely business," he said.

THE UNITED STATES did not have the privilege to contact Soviet diplomats under former President Carter's administration. Now a reciprocating agreement has been worked out, making communication rights more equal, according to Cook.

Joseph Hajda, associate professor of political science, agrees continuing communication with the Soviet Union is essential.

"I'm not completely pessimistic, because if you look at the statement made by Reagan in which he announced the sanctions against the Soviet Union just recently, he also emphasized a need for dialogue. So there is still a recognition that dialogue at the highest level, the upper levels and all levels is a very effective part of the policy of the United States," Hajda said.

U.S.-SOVIET cultural exchange programs are one area that Cook believes are in a poor state.

"The Soviet Union wanted us to pledge we'd ship any person who came to the U.S. on an exchange program back even if it was against their will, which we refused to do," Cook said. "So the cultural exchange program was never signed in 1980... Now it's in limbo."

Disarmament and arms control agreements are dependent on actions taken by the Soviets, Cook said.

"If the Soviets modify their position, then prospects are good that we'll have some kind of agreement...," Cook said. "It is something vitally important and should be carefully negotiated, even painfully so."

By-products

cholesterol, for cold creams and manufacturing vitamin D-3, Schafer said.

The beef by-product most widely known by consumers is the hide which provides leather.

HAIR FROM THE hide is used in making insulation and rug pads. The fine hair is used to produce artist's brushes, also referred to as "camel hair" brushes, Schafer said.

Bones, horns and hooves contribute in a variety of ways, providing such items as buttons, bone china, piano keys, glues, adhesives, wall paper, combs, toothbrushes and violin strings, he added.

Some of the more popular edible by-products provided by the beef industry include: ice cream, gelatin deserts, gum, candy, and marshmallows. Fats are also used in shortening, oil, and oleo stock and lard.

Sheep provide the highest percentage of by-products while beef is second and swine, third, Schafer said.

"This is not necessarily in terms of value," Dikeman said. While hogs may provide the lowest percentage of by-products, their uses contribute more to society in terms of pharmaceuticals, such as heart valves used in transplants and skin used for treating severe burn victims. Comparatively, sheep by-products provide less value despite the fact they yield the highest percentage.

SPAETH SAID sheep have the highest percentage of by-products which is due to their lower overall dressing percentage.

Although sheep do not yield the highest dressing percentage compared to beef and pork, they do provide the greatest percentage of by-products of their carcass value to the consumer. Many of their by-products contribute to the health, convenience and comfort to our society, he said.

One of the most popular by-product known to man is wool. Wool is most notably used for clothing and is characterized by its durability and quality. And, of course, the hide and skin as in beef and pork is use for leather, Spaeth said.

Special glues are used for paper, matches and window shades. Chemicals are also taken from sheep to help make tires, and bone charcoal is used for high grade steel, like that used to make ball-bearings, Spaeth added.

Many other sheep by-products which are similar to those from beef and pork include such uses as: horn and handles for carving sets; bone for bone china; lanolin for cosmetics; fats for soap; hides for drumheads and violins strings, and several other pharmaceutical and industrial products, Spaeth said.

Livestock by-products are important to consumers as well as the producer. Consumers depend more on the livestock industry than they realize and are developing an even stronger dependence, according to Schafer.

Mall developer makes progress in search for department stores

By ANNE SCHMITZ
Manhattan Editor
and JOY CULVER
Collegian Reporter

Manhattan appears to be one step closer to securing the department stores required to pass the Downtown Redevelopment project.

Mel Roebuck, vice president of Forest City Enterprises, developer for the project, appeared before city commissioners Tuesday night to provide a report on the progress the developer is making in trying to secure commitments from major department stoes for the proposed downtown mall. According to Roebuck, the prospects look promising.

"I am rather pleased and more exhilarated to report that we are significantly closer to getting a commitment from a second major department store," Roebuck said.

Roebuck said he had met with two other major stores that had indicated an interest in the project. However, he said no money was available.

Mayor Russell Reitz explained that in development projects such as this, the name of prospective companies the developer is dealing with cannot be revealed until a firm commitment is made with the developer.

Roebuck said he viewed the development business as "uneven and exhilarating, and known to produce ulcers." But, he said, "the prize is worth it."

"This ball game is a combination of my company and the city of Manhattan," Roebuck said. "I'm pleased to say the cooperation has continued unabated."

"Our major problem is the department stores and the economy," Roebuck said. Without commitments from major department stores, the project cannot be carried out.

"I also see on the part of some people in the community a lack of guts," Roebuck said. "These things not only take time, they're exasperating. I love it (the business), but it hurts and it's difficult. This is gonna come through — believe me."

Gloria Rumsey, president of the Manhattan Library Board, delivered a request to the commission to consider increasing the maximum mill levy for support of the library. Rumsey said this was necessary in order to properly fund the 1983 budget for the library.

Librarian Margaret Gates said increased use of the library by the public and the request for additional hours the facility is open to the public will require additional funding. She said personnel and utility costs are the most expensive, and if the ordinance in not passed, the library will be forced to cut back its hours of service. The present maximum levy of four mills was established by Charter Ordinance in 1976. The city is currently levying 3.861 mills for the 1982 budget.

The commission voted to allow the city staff to draw up a charter ordinance increasing the levy to 5 mills.

"Passing the ordinance would be like taking out an insurance policy," Rumsey said of the positive influence the Library has on the community.

Community developer Gary Stith delivered a report on the progress of the Commercial Rehabilitation Loan Program his staff is currently working on. According to Stith, the purpose of the program is to provide lower interest rate loans for the improvement of existing businesses in the downtown area that are older than five years. Stith said there would be a stipulation that a certain degree of the funds be used specifically for the improvement of the facade of the building, because this is what is most visible to the public.

Stith said he was hopeful that the study could be completed by next month so that an ordinance could be drawn up by the commission and action be taken.

Commissioners also approved the first reading of an ordinance setting a date and authorizing a bond election for the Westside swimming pool. A date of April 6 was proposed and commissioners agreed to a second reading of the proposal at a special meeting scheduled for Tuesday, Feb. 23 at 4:00 p.m.

Two-day toll in storm: 119

HALIFAX, Nova Scotia (AP) — Fifty-foot waves sank a Soviet freighter Tuesday in the icy North Atlantic, leaving 35 dead or missing and raising the number of feared fatalities to 119 in the storm-lashed area in two days.

The world's biggest oil rig, the Ocean Ranger, capsized Monday 200 miles east of Newfoundland, leaving one man drowned and 83 missing and feared dead. A federal investigation of the sinking has been announced.

On Tuesday, the freighter Mekhanik Tarasov went down 75 miles further east.

The Halifax Search and Rescue Center said 21 bodies were recovered from the freighter, 14 or 15 people were missing and five were rescued from the 4,262-ton container ship. A spokesman said the exact number of people aboard the Soviet ship was not known, but he believed it to be 40 or 41, not 37 as originally believed.

The center said two ships were hunting for survivors, that another ship and a plane were heading to the scene but that freezing conditions made it too dangerous for helicopters to fly and that more blinding snow was expected.

THE MEKHANIK TARASOV, en route to Europe from Trois-Rivieres, Quebec, had developed a 45-degree list overnight in 40 knot winds, heavy seas and freezing spray. Its cargo was not immediately known.

Senator receives bribery sentence in Abscam trial

UNIONDALE, N.Y. (AP) — An unrepentant Harrison Williams Jr., the only U.S. senator charged in the Abscam political corruption probe, was sentenced to three years in prison Tuesday for agreeing to sell his office for $12.6 million.

He could have been sentenced to 15 years for bribery.

Williams, who stood to make the money in a titanium mining deal involving an undercover FBI agent posing as a favor-seeking Arab sheik, also was fined $50,000 by U.S. District Court Judge George Pratt.

The judge issued concurrent sentences on each of Williams' nine convictions and stayed sentence pending appeal.

The 62-year-old New Jersey Democrat said after the hour-long session that he would continue to oppose his threatened expulsion from the Senate, where debate on such a resolution is to begin Feb. 23.

"I will fight my case in the United States Senate because I'm innocent and I know I didn't do anything wrong," Williams said outside the courthouse in this Long Island community.

Williams, a four-term senator, delivered a six-minute address during the hearing in which he told Pratt that Abscam, which has led to convictions against six members of the House of Representatives and several local officials, was "a sordid, manufactured attempt to get me to commit crime."

Damaged plane skids off runway

LOS ANGELES (AP) — A jetliner that hit two power pole cables and nearly crashed while landing had received no warning it was 500 feet too low because of damage to a control tower computer, authorities said Tuesday.

The Air California Boeing 737 with 122 people was making an approach at Ontario International Airport when it hit the cables Monday night and lost the use of its brakes. The plane was diverted to Los Angeles International Airport, 50 miles west, where it skidded off the runway and came to rest on a sandy embankment.

Nobody was seriously injured, although passengers were shaken up.

Flight 754 from Seattle and Oakland had been scheduled to land at Ontario but the control tower there said it was unable to tell the pilot his altitude because the tower's instrument landing computer was not working.

That left the pilot on a visual approach through light rain and clouds, authorities said.

The controller guiding the plane at Ontario noticed nothing out of the ordinary before the cables were hit, said Jim Holtsclaw, facilities chief of Federal Aviation Administration at Ontario.

"We couldn't tell anything was wrong," Holtsclaw said. "It is our responsibility to advise a pilot if he is too low if we see it. But the controller said he was looking at him and he didn't see anything unusual about his altitude."

Holtsclaw said the plane must have been at least 500 feet too low in its approach to have hit the cables. It was not immediately known whether the jetliner's altimeter had been checked.

Air Cal spokesman Mark Peterson said the plane's hydraulic system, including its brakes, was damaged when it clipped the half-inch-thick steel cables atop the power pole.

The plane's reverse thrusters also were not working because of damage from the cables, Peterson said.

Without brakes or reverse thrusters, the plane was unable to come to a stop on Los Angeles' 12,000-foot runway, so the pilot steered the plane to the right off the runway and it skidded to a stop on a dirt embankment.

Mayor says God will punish 'terrorist' Soviets

NEW YORK — Mayor Edward I. Koch said Tuesday that he believes the Soviet Union will be punished by God and ultimately fall apart.

He spoke while receiving an award at City Hall as "Person of the Year" from the Gonen Society, an organization of Jewish members of the city's transit police.

Sgt. Robert Abraham said Koch was being honored for his "sincere feeling for police officers" and for "speaking out against terrorism in the streets."

A report in the Soviet newspaper Pravda on Monday accused Koch of inciting terrorist violence against United Nations diplomats by criticizing an anti-Israeli resolution in the General Assembly.

Koch responded: "If you had to say there was a No. 1 terrorist organization, it would be the Soviet Union....They terrorize their own people, aside from terrorizing other people."

He added: "I also believe the Soviet Union will ultimately fall apart. Who said that? Not Ed Koch. Solzhenitsyn! Sakharov! Don't you believe God's going to punish them? I believe in God. God's going to punish them."

Alexander Solzhenitsyn and Andrei Sakharov are renowned Soviet dissidents.

Speed limit proposal accelerates in House

TOPEKA — A proposal that would raise the speed limit on interstate highways in Kansas if Congress abolishes the current 55 mph speed limit, gained a foothold of support in the House Transportation Committee Tuesday.

The measure, sponsored by Rep. Leary Johnson (R-WaKeeney), would set a limit of 65 mph on all four-lane interstates, the Kansas Turnpike and selected two-lane highways in the state.

No action was taken on the bill.

"When a majority of the people are ignoring a law it does not mean they are not law-abiding citizens," Johnson said. "It means they are just showing their displeasure with the law."

Committee response to the proposal was positive, and several members bargained with opponents to consider a compromise on the measure.

"I would say that I could probably live with a 60 mph limit if the grace period is abolished and we get these stricter penalties," said Col. David Hornbaker, superintendant for the Kansas Highway Patrol. Hornbaker testified in opposition to the bill.

"I'm convinced that the 55 mph limit has saved lives and reduced injuries," Hornbaker said. "I do think the penalties in this bill would gain voluntary compliance and there would be less spending."

Governor's guests chosen in essay contest

ANNAPOLIS, Md. — The guest list for drinks and hors d'oeuvres with Gov. Harry Hughes includes a prison inmate, a first grader and a fired government worker.

They are among those chosen by legislator David Shapiro from 136 people who wrote to say why they'd like to speak to the governor. Shapiro asked for essays on the subject after being advised to invite six people to a March 1 reception with Hughes and his wife.

Also on Shapiro's guest list are a man twice convicted of drunken driving, a girls' school teacher and a handicapped war veteran.

Shapiro said he was doing Hughes a favor, explaining: "He's under a lot of criticism by the populace that he's having a political affair — just the delegates and their political buddies.

"I'm showing that he is willing to allow the delegates to bring whoever they want to."

Government provides cheese for Kansas needy

TOPEKA — Distribution of more than 330,000 pounds of processed American cheese under a federal program began Tuesday to five Kansas communities, Gov. John Carlin announced.

When all shipments have been received, the U.S. Department of Agriculture will have delivered 1,120 cases of cheese, each weighing 30 pounds, to Topeka, Junction City, Kansas City, Pleasanton and Wichita.

The Kansas National Guard will unload the trucks at the communities and then ship some of it to Hays, Garden City, Pittsburg and Cherryvale.

The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services is handling the distribution program, and has received applications from charitable nonprofit organizations to give the cheese away to low-income needy persons.

As a federal requirement, those organizations must give SRS a list of individuals who are to receive the cheese. After that is approved, the groups will announce publicly when people can begin to pick up the cheese.

Additional songs viable alternative

"Kansas, dear old Kansas,
Where the corn and pumpkins grow."

These are the first lyrics to the song "Kansas, Dear Old Kansas," written by George Stawitz. A bill was presented to the Kansas legislature, sponsored by Sen. Elwaine Pomeroy, R-Topeka, last week calling for this tune to replace the current state song, "Home On The Range."

"Home on the Range" may not actually mention the name Kansas but replacing it would cause an uproar and necessarily so. Tradition is tradition. "Home on the Range" is a song known worldwide. Thus Kansans can feel an extra sense of pride, although fewer individuals recognize the tune as the Kansas state song.

Efforts have been made in the past to replace the national anthem because the high-C note it contains is difficult for the average vocal chords to handle. The lyrics of the anthem, and fifty or more state songs, can be a great inspiration to many people whether they are trained vocalists or not.

Instead of of replacing the current state song, the legislature could take an initiative from the state of Tennesse. Its legislature recently voted to make "Rocky-Top" a state song, its fifth. If Tennesse sees it fit to have five state songs then Kansas could make room for two.

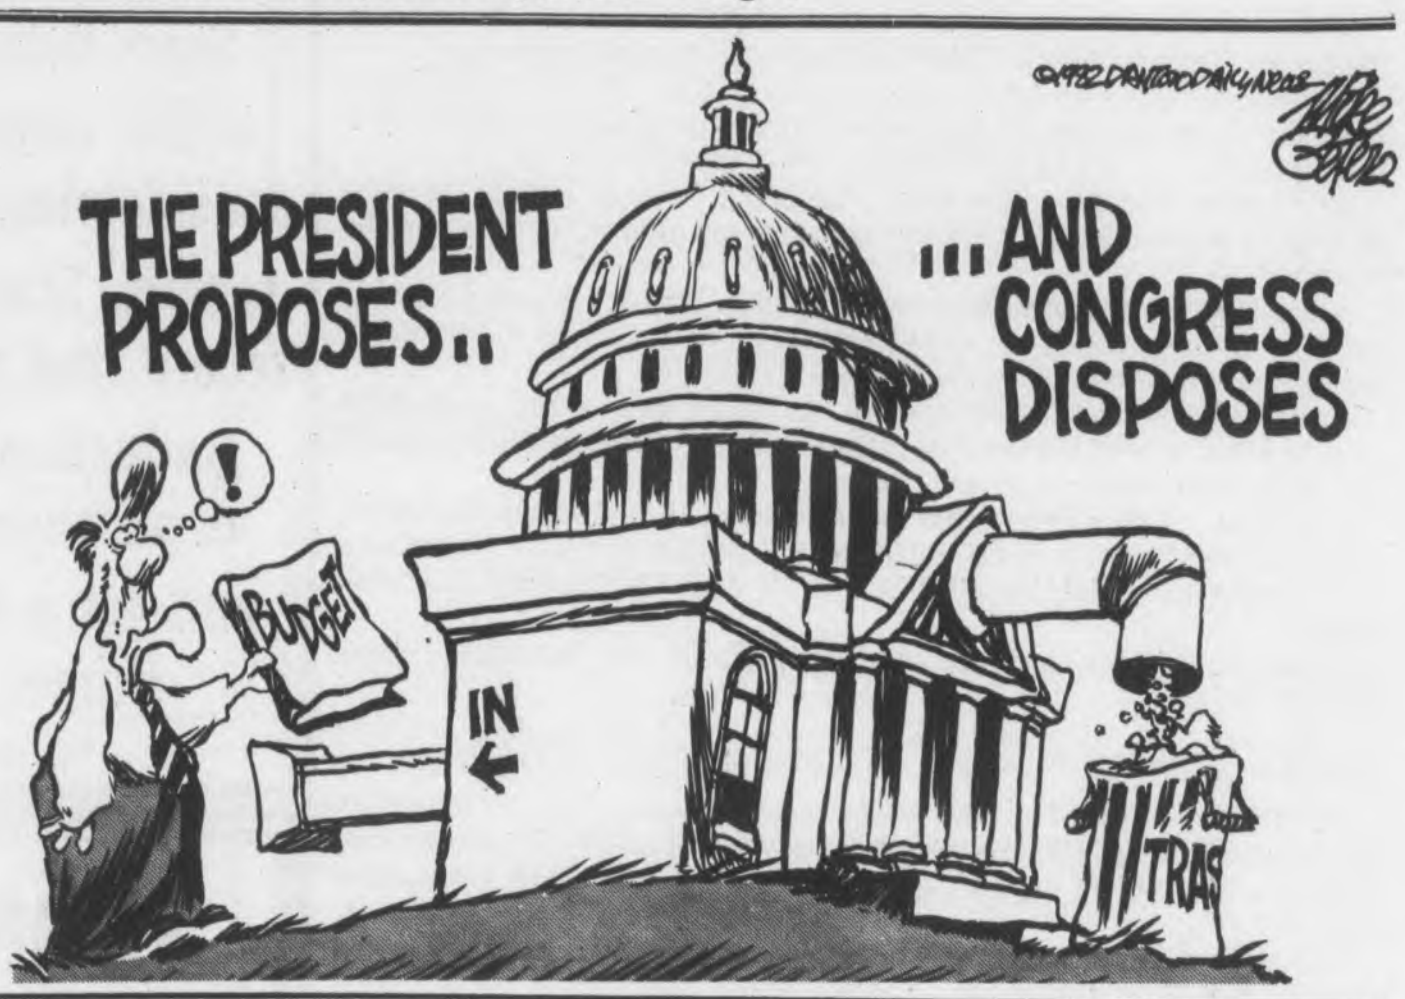
Holiday policies cause confusion

The policy of allowing states to chose their own days to celebrate what were originally national holidays has to be changed.



In the past, everyone knew George Washington's Birthday and Abraham Lincoln's Birthday were on the 22nd and 12th of February, respectively.

This year, and in the recent past, no one seems to know when to celebrate the birthdays of these historic figures. Some states celebrate them on the original days. Some states celebrate the Washington's Birthday on the third Monday in February as part of the plan to allow workers three-day weekends. Some states combine the two into "Presidents' Day," diluting the celebrations further.

Three-day weekends are great, but the commemorations were originally scheduled for a certain day for specific reasons.

There is nothing wrong with celebrating the special days on a Monday, but consistency is necessary for days of national import.

A record made to be broken

A foot kept hitting me in the back of the head, and some of the snow clinging to it had to be coming off in my hair, but I really had no right to complain. Her knee was being jammed into her face each time the over-loaded car took a dip in the street just a little too speedily.

Rule number one: Dormies do everything in groups.

The Lincoln was still safely below its load limit. I hear the record is 15 people, but since I missed that particular trip I can hardly verify that number. I imagine, however, that this figure will yet be broken. This time we had a mere seven in the back seat...I was one of the ingenious four who had finagled a comfortable niche in the front.

The pseudo-bus spun its tires on the ice and managed to inch its way out the driveway and onto Manhattan Avenue. Screams accompanied the move — our courageous driver had miscalculated the Lincoln's ability to carry so much weight into the traffic flow even semi-quickly.

HOURS LATER, the entourage was moving down 11th Street. The red toplights of a law enforcement vehicle were sighted a scant two blocks later. In a fit of panic, (and with the help of everyone leaning towards the right direction), the whole thing took to the side streets. "Everybody duck," someone yelled, as the officer's car followed. He soon gave up, however, probably due to the fact that our absolute top speed was little more than 20 mph.

Rule number two: Dormies develop into close circles by floors and hang out together, but it may only last for a semester or two. You may not know who the next kid in the top bunk will be.

We crossed a deep gully of a street, and the foot hit me in the back of the head again. But I remained quiet since it was accompanied by several other groans originating from various spots amid the confusion in the back seat. The head at the other end of the foot let out a yell, and the unfortunate soul sitting under my roommate complained loudly about her boney rear end. Still we persevered and continued on.

MIRACULOUSLY, we reached Poyntz Avenue, never quite realizing how we had made it there. The end would come soon, and the natives became restless. The driver was implored to ignore the possibility of tickets, speeding or otherwise. She refused, and continued the sneak through the side streets.

Rule number three: Although some claim residence halls are cold and impersonal, dormies like to meet lots of new people and enjoy participating in hall activities.

The destination had finally been reached. As its occupants climbed out, the Lincoln breathed a sigh of relief. Unfortunately, it must have thought, the load would be even heavier on the return trip. The amateur sardines had come in search of late-night doughnuts.

"Should we eat here, in the car or wait until we get back?" someone asked.

"No, don't you dare! My car!" The trip home resumed as soon as the 11 had carefully assumed their former positions. A long time later and a short ways down the road, the same voice rang out, "I smell chocolate! My car!"

Rule number four: Dormies lack the maturity and independence of off-campus students, while missing out on the self-esteem of greeks.

Personally, I hope to someday shatter the current record of 15 in my little fire bomb of a Pinto. Records are made to be broken, after all.

True government requires votes

Editor,

I have been a critic of student elections for a number of reasons. However, I feel we need to look at the figures of last week's elections. Approximately 3000 students voted, only 15 percent of the K-State population. Maybe we don't understand the importance of involvement?

Any law is only as good or as effective as the people who choose to obey, or not to obey. If few people obey it, you have no law. Similarly, elected officials are only as good or as effective as the people who elect them. If only a few people elect and support them, you have no true government or representation. People make the difference.

The start of this country was based upon "We the People." More and more, we have begun to say "they, the elected government." Voting is only the tip of the iceberg. Our involvement does not end when our candidates take office but voting is the start.

If the run-off election today is the same as last week, the winner will only represent 15 percent of the K-State population. "We the People" are going to have to make many difficult decisions in the years to come. We can make a difference if we are informed, know what we want and vote. Practice your decision making now and show the candidates that "We the People" care. Go vote.

Estate bequest establishes scholarship fund

A new scholarship fund has been established through a $79,832.29 bequest from the estate of Earl Thompson.

The Virgil and Earl Thompson Scholarship Fund will assist "financially deserving" students, according to James Miller, associate director of the KSU Foundation.

Thompson, a World War I veteran, worked in several small banks and was with the State Banking Department for four years. He was head bookkeeper and accountant for the Package Corporation of America, Kansas City, Kan., until his retirement in 1946.

The Thompsons had no children, and decided to leave their assets to the University for scholarship funding. The scholarships will go to students who are full-time residents of Kansas and who have exhibited financial need, Miller said.

"I only regret that the Foundation and K-State were not able to thank the Thompsons in a more meaningful fashion for their generous underwriting which expresses their belief in the mission of public higher education," he said.

Professor recieves support for gene study

A three-year study of "Genetics and Biochemistry of Mouse Development," being conducted by Vernon Bode, professor of biology, has received additional support from a $213,238 grant.

The National Institute of Child Health and Human Development awarded Bode the grant to support the study of a cluster of genes that regulate embryonic development and selectively alter the fertilization efficiency of sperm. The overall purpose of the project is to increase understanding as to how those genes control mammalian development.

The mouse was selected as the experimental animal because it is biochemically and genetically similar to other mammals, its embryos are readily manipulated and a lot is already known about its genetics. The small size and short gestation period of the mouse make its breeding and maintenance much less expensive than the production and care of other animals.

Students qualify as finalists for scholarship

Two students have been named finalists in one of the most prestigious undergraduate scholarships offered in the United States — the Truman Scholarship.

Mike Gibson and David Carlin, sophomores in political science and prelaw, were selected in university-wide competition. The Truman Scholarships were established by Congress as a memorial to former President Harry S. Truman. Sophomores planning government careers in public service, welfare, public administration and education are eligible. The one Truman Scholar chosen in each state receives up to $20,000 during a maximum of four years of study.

'A Day in Time' wins student national award

This year's national winner of the Music Teachers National Association Composition Award is Janet Riedel, a graduate teaching assistant in the Department of Music.

Riedel won the national contest for a song cycle titled, "A Day in Time." Riedel's prize-winning song cycle has also received the K-State Blue Key-Mistler "creativity award," and had been judged the best entry for Kansas and for the West Central Division, an eight-state region.

Riedel, who holds a bachelor's degree in music education, is working on a masters in music in vocal performance. She teaches voice, directs the University Chorus and participates in Opera Workshop activities.

Professor to participate in diplomat program

The State Department has invited Jacob Kipp, associate professor of history, to be involved in the Department of State Diplomat Program this spring. This award is granted two times a year, for both fall and spring sequences.

"The idea behind the program is to have academic members and members of the Foreign Service meet to exchange ideas in their common areas of expertise," Kipp said.

Kipp, whose special interest is the Soviet Union — including Soviet defense policies and arms control — will be working with representatives in Soviet and European affairs.

Kipp joined the faculty in August 1971. He received his bachelor's of science degree in education from Shippensburg State College, Shippensburg, Pa. He obtained his masters and doctoral degrees in history from Pennsylvania State University. Kipp has also studied at Warsaw State University, Poland, and Leningrad State University, USSR.

Soviets face problems in remodeling world

The Soviet Union feels compelled to create a world in their own image, but are not having much success at meeting that goal, according to Paul Cook, special assistant for the US State Department's Bureau of Intelligence.

Cook spoke before a crowd of about 150 in Forum Hall Tuesday night. He was the first speaker in the 1982 Lou Douglas Lecture Series being sponsored by University For Man.

China's recent favoritism towards the US rather than towards the USSR, as it has been in the past, has hurt the Soviets, Cook said.

"I do not know of a single Soviet who would not trade over their gains in Angola, Afghanistan and Cuba, Ethiopia, etc. for the return of China to the Moscow fold," he said.

Militarily, the Soviets are not too far ahead or behind the US, according to Cook, "although the reports say we are."

"The truth is we probably lie somewhere in between. The Soviets have had a 75 percent build-up per anum. We built up (arms) until mid§decade, then we cut back at the end of the Viet Nam war."

The Soviet economic basis is only about half as much as the US's economic base, although "since WWII the Soviet economy has grown by leaps and bounds," he said.

The US has declining rates of growth and factory production because of the current recession, Cook said, whereas the Soviet economy has increased by three-plus percent.

"The Soviet economy is systematically weak but not as vulnerable as they would have us believe. They are still a powerful bear and one that would hurt if it strikes us.

"They offer to deploy their SS20's beyond Europe, but they still threaten Japan and China and they can still hit all but the Shetlands (Islands) and Gibralter (Spain)," he said. "I cannot leave you with any hope of nirvana right around the corner. It's difficult to speculate about the future."

"It's scary as hell," Cook answered. "There has been a proliferation of nuclear weapons by other countries. The nuclear genie is out of the bottle and it's surprising something hasn't happened since the genie has been out."

Digital sounds echo within McCain

By CATHY CARLSON
Collegian Reporter

A small room in McCain Auditorium contains electronic equipment that rivals what viewers might see in a science-fiction movie. Clustered together, the various controls and dials resemble what one might observe on the bridge of the starship Enterprise.

Rather than representing a complex battleship's futuristic controls, the room is the Department of Music's electronic music studio, and in the center of all its gadgetry is the newest addition to the studio, a digital computer synthesizer — the Crumar General Development System (CGDS).

K-State was the second university in the country to obtain a CGDS, according to Hanley Jackson, associate professor of music, who is currently working with Music Tectonics Inc. as a CGDS synthesizer consultant.

The synthesizer can make sounds of atonal instruments (true electronics) or it can imitate acoustical instruments such as the flute, trumpet, harpsichord or the koto, a Japanese harp, Jackson said.

BEFORE PURCHASING the CGDS, the Department of Music had only analog synthesizers, which make electronic signals. The CGDS is a digital synthesizer which allows for many different sounds and voices to be made, Jackson said.

"The advantage of a digital synthesizer is that it's very accurate — voices and sounds can be easily recalled," he said.

A student in an electronic music class learns how to run the equipment, make different sounds and compose voices.

By using different programs, the student can design each instrument and then place it into an orchestra, Jackson said. The addition of timing information creates the musical score, he added.

"You can compare it to working with an orchestra," Jackson said.

By pushing different buttons on the console, Jackson demonstrated how he could change the speed of the music, transpose and edit. Jackson created flute and trumpet sounds, along with producing alien sounds from the synthesizer.

A STUDENT WHO wants to enroll in one of the electronic music classes should have a background in either music or electronics, "otherwise you would be totally lost," he said.

Usually a team of two students work together on the synthesizer, one will have a music background and the other will have an electronics background, Jackson explained.

"Students are afraid to 'cross-over' disciplines, and working together helps relieve that fear," he said.

In an effort to help acquaint persons with the system, Jackson will give a public recital of electronic music at 11:30 a.m. Tuesday in All Faiths Chapel. Jackson said he has also written a text for use in the music department's electronic music classes.

Rudy Marcozzi, graduate in music, said he enrolled in the course because he was "pretty secure about common music," and had always been interested in electronic music.

"We'll (class members) realize our own music later in the semester. Now we're learning to use the machine with voices that are already developed.

"It's pretty logical," Marcozzi said. "If you know the principles, it's common sense."

Women post 11th straight victory

By TIM UNRUH
Sports Editor

What a season those K-State women are having!

With three games to go, the Wildcats have already clinched a bid to the NCAA Championships, and have won the Big Eight Tournament.

Tuesday night added another page to Head Coach Lynn Hickey's book of memories.

Priscilla Garey gunned in a career-high 29 points, and Barbara Gilmore added 17, pacing the Wildcats to an 82-74 win over the Drake Bulldogs.

The win marked the 11th in a row for the 'Cats, tying a school record, set by the 1968-69 women's team.

K-State jumped out to an early lead, but it took quite a fight to remain ahead.

Tammie Romstad started things rolling for the 'Cats, but the game belonged to Gary. The opening tip went to K-State's Jean Roise, who quickly whipped a pass to Romstad for a ten-footer from the right side.

Hickey was concerned with the outside shooting of Drake, and opened in a man-to-man defense in an effort to cool things.

"Drake is a tremendous shooting team," Hickey said. "It's their game to shoot well from the outside and shoot a lot of freethrows."

The Bulldogs netted from 14 of 18 from the line for 77.8 percent. K-State shot 62.5 percent sinking 10 of 16 charities.

The Wildcats looked to Gary to spark some momentum, and regain the lead. Gary acted quickly and tied things with a steal and fast break off the glass. She did a repeat performance with 15:22 to go, swishing one home from five feet This put the 'Cats ahead for good 10-8.

With 11:54 left, Drake's Amy McDermott was called for traveling on a drive to the basket. Drake Head Coach Carole Baumgarten was issued a technical foul for her verbal outburst. Roise missed the penalty freethrow, but Gilmore's shot in the lane put the 'Cats up by seven points, 21-14.

Hickey had no complaints about the officiating.

"The refs weren't the greatest, but I've seen worse," Hickey said. "The officials let us play, and allowed a lot of fouls both ways."

Shelly Hughes sank a bucket from underneath with 8:31 left putting the Wildcats up by 10 points 32-22.

From there, the 'Cats took off to the races. Angie Bonner tipped in a shot at the buzzer to up the K-State lead to 17 points 43-26, at intermission.

In the second half, the Bulldogs outscored K-State 48-39.

Lorri Bauman scored on a layup with 9:56 to go, reducing the K-State lead to 10 at 62-52. The Bulldogs scored four more unanswered points cutting the lead to six. But Gary's razzle-dazzle shot underneath at the 8:36 mark led to a three-point play for the 'Cats, as she sank the freethrow.

Drake made two more runs at the 'Cats, only to watch Gary cool the rally with a layup.

The Bulldogs dropped to 19-6 on the season, while the Wildcats are 20-5.

Next action for the 'Cats is Saturday, as they play host to Creighton.

The Black Student Union salutes Black History Month in Politics

Yvonne Burke, elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1972.

Yvonne Braithwaite Burke, attorney and former California State Assemblywoman became the first black woman from California ever to be elected to the House of Representatives in November, 1972.

Congresswoman Burke served in the State Assembly for six years prior to her election to Congress. During her final two years in there, she was Chairman of the Committee on Urban Development and Housing and a member of the Health Finance and Insurance Committees.

As a state legislator, Mrs. Burke was responsible for enactment of bills providing for needy children and relocation of tenants and owners of homes taken by government action and one which required major medical insurance programs to grant immediate coverage to newborn infants of the insured.

Mrs. Burke's district, created in 1971 by the California legislature, contains low and middle income blacks and integrated neighborhoods.

In 1973, Mrs. Burke became the first Congresswoman to give birth while in office, to a daughter, Autumn Roxanne Burke.

Men's squad returns to face OSU in Ahearn

By HOWARD RICHMAN
Sports Writer

Men's basketball returns tonight to Ahearn Field House as K-State hosts Oklahoma State. The Wildcats are currently in second place in the Big Eight conference with a 7-3 record. The Wildcats, 17-5 overall, are ranked 18th in the Associated Press poll.

K-State improved its record by defeating Iowa State 58-49 on Saturday. At the same time, Oklahoma State fell to conference leader Missouri, 89-82. The Cowboys defeated the Wildcats in the first confrontation earlier this season, 56-53.

Head Coach Jack Hartman pointed out the strong points of the visitors from Stillwater.

"Oklahoma State has a lot of experience and good team speed. They like to get into a transition game, move the ball up and down the court. We'll have to play well and have good execution to win," Hartman said.

The Cowboys, 5-5 in league games, are led in scoring by Leroy Combs and Matt Clark. They average 12 points each game while Eddie Hannon dishes out the assists. Hannon leads the Big Eight in that department with 5.1 a game.

Oklahoma State Head Coach Paul Hansen listed the ingredients his squad must mix together in order to stop K-State.

"There are three things we need to do. We have to get some rebounds, shoot free throws better and hit the shots from point-blank range," Hansen said.

"We haven't really produced in the last three or four games. If we want to finish in the top four of the conference we're going to have to go out and win," he said.

Hansen was referring to the first round of the post season tournament where the top four teams in the conference receive the home court advantage.

K-State is using the scoring of Randy Reed (15 ppg) and Tyrone Adams (14 ppg). Ed Nealy is leading the conference in rebounding with a 8.5 per game average. Tim Jankovich is adding 10 points a game in Big Eight contests. He is also hitting 95 percent from the charity stripe in league tilts.

Oklahoma State handed the Wildcats their only home loss of the season a year ago, 90-83. The Cowboys have won two of the last three and K-State leads the all-time series 54-14.

In the only other conference game tonight, Kansas, 4-6, travels to Colorado, 2-9. Missouri,10-1, beat Iowa State, 2-9, 100-71 last night in Columbia, and Nebraska, 6-5, defeated Oklahoma 65-51 on Monday. Oklahoma also has a record of 6-5.

Prior to the Wildcats-Cowboys clash, the K-State junior varsity team will play its final game of the season against Dodge City Community College.

Brier suggests earlier date for presidential primary

TOPEKA (AP) — Kansas' first presidential primary election in 1980 increased registration by 88,700 voters, shouldn't have cost the state nearly as much as it did, and drew the biggest primary turnout in state history, Secretary of State Jack Brier said Tuesday.

"It is the first thing that has happened in many years to heighten public interest in the political parties," Brier told the Senate Elections Committee. "But, most important of all, it produced the largest turnout in history for a primary."

He testified in support of a bill sponsored by Sen. Mike Johnston,(D-Parsons), which would make Kansas' presidential primary a permanent fixture, in 1984 and beyond.

Both Brier and Johnston acknowledged there are changes which should be made in the mechanics of the election — mainly moving the date for it considerably earlier than the first Tuesday in April, as it was two years ago. They said they can be considered next year.

THEY SAID the Legislature should make the basic policy decision this year to keep the presidential primary. The 1978 law which created it for 1980 had an automatic sunsetting provision. Unless the Legislature acts, it will not be held again in 1984, the next time the U.S. elects a president.

They said it is important candidates know two years in advance that Kansas will have an election, so they can include this state on their campaign agenda.

Brier said he was not a supporter of the presidential primary originally, "but the enthusiasm of the people for it changed my mind."

Brier said 88,700 people registered ahead of the 1980 presidential primary, and those new voters increased the number of registered Republicans by 5.4 percent and the number of registered Democrats by 3.5 percent.

THE INCREASED REGISTRATION also led to a record primary turnout of 479,316 voters on April 1, 1980 — or 42 percent of the registered voters. That turnout surpassed by 90,000 the number who voted in the state's regular August primary two years ago, and by 158,000 the number who turned out for the August 1980 primary.

"I think, clearly, the people have demonstrated their interest in this election," said Brier. "It was the first time our voters had an opportunity to share the candidates' views and participate in the selection of a president, and they responded most positively."

The secretary of state, a Republican, rejected suggestions from Roitz and Sen. Ron Hein,(R-Topeka), the committee chairman, that the election might not have been worth the cost because no major candidates campaigned in the state ahead of the primary two years ago.

First, Brier noted the Legislature appropriated slightly more than $1 million to pay for it, and that was spent. Secondly, he said, if the cities and counties had assumed their proper share of the cost for local elections which also were held that day, the state's share should have been only about $350,000.

Friends show informal fun of performing

By LESLIE FROST
Arts and Entertainment Editor

An idea which came to Brian Tucker during the Christmas holidays grew into a 12-person Nooner production, a performance of "Brian Tucker and Friends."

"I wanted a way to get up here and perform before I graduated," Tucker, senior in psychology, told the audience.

Eleven of Tucker's friends joined him, playing and singing solo numbers or in small groups of two or more. The instruments played ranged from piano to mountain dulcimer, the songs from blues to ragtime. Some of the performers are serious musicians, according to Tucker, while to some, music is a hobby. The individuals chose what they performed in most cases, although, "I had some favorites," Tucker said.

Tucker has played some sort of show with the members of the "friends."

"We used to play in the stairwell in our hall," he said. Because not all those playing knew the others playing, Tucker held a Saturday pre-Nooner party, he said.

"I think the major idea was for everybody to have a good time." Tucker

The first song was an acoustic guitar number Tucker wrote. Kent Hermes, junior in radio and television, played a part he called "E Meistro," or "The Teacher," while Tucker's part he called "The Promise of the Lights."

The second song again featured Hermes, this time on harmonica and sharing the stage with Andy Sandler, sophomore in radio and television, on guitar. The two played a "blues commentary" Sandler wrote. They convinced the audience to make the sounds of high-hat cymbals and to snap their fingers in time, as Hermes drew soulful, plaintive, sometimes agonized notes from the harmonica.

"We weren't afraid of failing. We just wanted to have a good time, have a good time with our music." Tucker

The third song moved back into the realm of mellow music with Tucker on the mountain dulcimer and Sandler on guitar playing

They number 370. They can be found in biology labs, speech classes and physics recitation. Their mission is to help educate while they are being educated. They can be identified by their harried expressions and tired eyes.

These persons are none other than K-State's graduate teaching assistants, better known as GTAs.

Students interested in becoming GTAs apply for the positions when they enter graduate school. They are evaluated on the basis of their academic credentials. Candidates are then chosen by the individual department heads or committees formed within the department.

At the beginning of each school term, the GTAs are expected to attend a program designed to "touch the highlights of their responsiblities," according to Robert Kruh, graduate shcool dean.

"Some departments, like chemistry and math, have more specific programs tailored to meet the needs of the individual department. There is no consistent pattern among the different departments," Kruh explained.

KRUH SAID he believes the GTA program is beneficial to both the teaching assistant and the class.

"By teaching they (GTAs) are providing good experience for those in their classes and they gain additional experience teaching. Plus the income the GTAs receive helps them to further their education," he said.

The experience gained is not without its cost.

"I don't sleep very much. The most difficult part of GTA work is the amount of time spent and having to keep things organized in my mind," said Dave Tompkins, graduate in speech and a GTA for his fourth semester.

ASIDE FROM his responsibilities as GTA and student, Tompkins is also active in theater. His days are always full, but he believes the experience he's getting is worth the long hours.

"I want to eventually teach at the university level, and the only way to get any experience is this way," he said.

Sally Wampler, graduate student in journalism and mass communications, also finds the GTA experience worthwhile.

"Everything's great. My students think I'm doing a good job and I think they're terrific," she said.

The response to the GTA program is not always positive, but according to Kruh that is to be expected.

"I'm sure it's a mixed thing. There may be some people who have some dissatisifaction with the program. Most of the GTAs I know are well-prepared and enthusiastic," Kruh said.

STUDENT RESPONSE to their contact with GTAs varies.

"Some (GTAs) have been very helpful and have overextended themselves. In some cases they're better than the instructors," Hannah Robinson, senior in sociology, said. "Others have been inflexible and generally not very understanding. Sometimes they make you feel dumb."

Robinson said she believes most of the GTAs she has had were competent in their field.

"I think it really varies. I've had some bad and some good ones," Alan Myers, senior in pre-veterinary science, said. "There is some inconsistency among GTAs. Some don't seem to care and don't get involved."

However, Myers feels the program is good.

"It benefits them (the GTAs). It's a great experience and the GTAs learn a lot," he said.

"I believe by and large students have a very positive educational experience with the teaching assistants," Kruh added.

AGRs win Quadrathlon title

The score was tied. Each team was given the opportunity to answer a question. The first team to respond with the correct answer would emerge victorious.

Weber 107 was packed as the AGRs prevailed over the Whitesells Wonders in the University's first Animal Science Academic Quadrathlon.

Thirty faculty members and 28 students, representing seven teams, participated in the event that began Feb. 9. Graduate students and others helped in the staging, said Curtis Kastner, chairman of the quadrathlon and associate professor in animal science.

Teams competed both on the ninth and again on Feb. 11 toward an end of selecting the two top teams that would be slated to go against one another in last night's quiz bowl.

As the AGRs won, they will travel to Chicago in March to compete in the Midwest Animal Science Contest.

"I liked the intensity and competition that was evident of the previous quiz bowls and especially tonight," said Jeff Bryant, member of the winning team and senior in animal science.

"I think the questions were diverse and spread out," said Jeff Johnson, member of the second place team and senior in poultry science.

THE NIGHT STARTED on a light note as faculty members were given the chance to compete in a humorous take-off on the quiz bowl. Kastner suprised the audience by choosing faculty members and questioning them (an unexpected role reversal). Chuckles arose from the crowd as Kastner spewed out questions concerning pretty girls on the Texas A&M campus rather than debeaking chicks on the K-State campus.

The foundation had been built in earlier competition.

There were four divisions: the quiz bowl, oral presentation, laboratory practical and a written exam.

Seven teams of four members competed with no points scored for individual team members, everything was done as a team effort. No coaching was needed, just knowledge in areas such as nutrition, reproduction and genetics.

The Quadrathlon was an opportunity for student and faculty interaction and for the students to relate information consumed in the classroom, Kastner said.

HANDS WERE placed tentatively on the response button, poised, ready to respond within the 5-second time limit. This was it, "a very pressured situation," according to Gary Allee, moderator of the game and professor of animal science.

"The team has an audience (watching them), plus once they commit themselves to the question, they answer or lose points," he said.

As the 10-point questions are asked, a member of the team responds. If the question is answered incorrectly, the team loses 10 points.

All the information for the questions and for the entire contest were submitted and then reviewed by animal science professors to avoid repeated or unclear questions according to Guy Kiracofe, student faculty adviser to the contest and professor of animal science.

Allee said he was suprised and disappointed in the teams' performances.

"When you have freshmen and seniors competing (against one another), you're going to have a myriad of backgrounds," Allee said. A team's success depends on the extent of its members' experiences, he said.

IN THE ORAL presentation the role of the students was reversed — they were teaching the teachers.

Each team had an hour and a half to prepare its presentation on a topic relative to animal science, one it was comfortable with. Presenting the topic in one half hour to a group of faculty members, the team had the option of using such avenues as debate, an interview or even a skit, according to James Morrill, professor of animal science.

"I was impressed with the creative ability of the teams, and the way they illustrated their topics," Morrill said.

One of the topics discussed was embryo transplanting. In this discussion, the team employed debate methods, using the combined knowledge of team members to present advantages and disadvantages.

"This gave the student an appreciation for the instuctors postion," Kastner said.

Evaluating feedstuffs (identifying irregularities), palpating a sow (checking for pregnancy) or giving a chick a vaccination were some of seven stations used in the laboratory practical. Duane Davis, supervisor of the laboratory contest and professor in animal science, said he liked what he saw.

The AGRs were strongest in the lab practical, according to the team. They said that the contest provided the opportunity to pool resources and work together.

THE FINAL SEGMENT of the contest was a written examination consisting of 100 questions.

"The exam was intended to have more questions than time available for completion," John Wheat, professor of animal science, said.

"The test was a good representative of animal science, some easy and some difficult," Wheat said.

Although the top score was not 100 percent, Wheat said he was optimistic about the results. He added that it is "gratifying" to see that students are retaining what is being taught.

The Quadrathlon was designed for students and faculty as another vehicle for learning, Kiracofe said.

"A unification of faculty and team members was the fruit born from the contest," he said.

The general belief among faculty and students was that the contest provided them a greater understanding for the subject and for each other, Kiracofe said.

He continued: "With this many faculty and students, working so closely with each other you are bound to have some unification."

Deadline approaches for draft registration

By CHRIS MOORE
Collegian Reporter

Uncle Sam still wants you ... to register for the draft this month.

Failure to register for the draft could result in males, ages 18 to 20, inadvertently committing a felony. The last day to register with the selective service is Feb. 28. After this date, males face the possibility of prosecution.

"The actual penalty in the law for failing to register is a felony, carrying a maximum fine of $10,000 and five years in prison," said Junior Elder, director of the Kansas Selective Service. He added that the law will be "strictly enforced."

"I am firmly convinced the Justice Department will move on them (those failing to register). I think they are going to move all available manpower on this," he said.

Registration turnout in Kansas was above the national average in 1981, according to Elder.

As of Sept. 30, 12,000 of a potential 14,000 Kansans had registered. On a national level, 800,000 men had registered, according to Betty Alexander, public affairs officer for the National Selective Service.

PRESIDENT RONALD REAGAN'S Jan. 7 decision to continue registration, coupled with the absence of an active military draft, has caused some confusion for those required to register, Elder said.

"For those born in years between 1960 and 1962, we had registered approximately 98 percent. For those born in 1963, we had 82.2

percent register compared to the national average in the low 70 percent margin," he said. The lower percentage of males born in 1963 having registered may be explained by Reagan's late decision on whether to continue registration.

"I'm confident that a good number of young men don't know they have to register," he said.

Unlike the 1960s, registration during the '80s is going smoothly in Kansas, Elder said.

"There was very little (resistance) in an organized manner. There was some in areas where there have always been pockets of resistance. Manhattan has had less resistance than other college campuses," he said.

Violators of the registration laws are dealt with by the federal government though state officials usually discover the violation.

"Our national office writes to the person, encouraging them to register. If they do not, we turn it over to the justice department," Elder said.

"In my experience, those who don't plan to register aren't bothered by the penalties. In Kansas, we've prosecuted two people who said they would rather go to jail than fight. We obliged them," he said.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS (CO) are still required to register, even though they don't necessarily have to serve in combat, Alexander said. The CO status is not a deferment, but a standard set in law.

"It is a statement of belief of how an individual's life is affected by what he believes in. It is a moral, ethical and religious desire not to participate in war. That statement is then reviewed by the local draft board for validity," he said.

Jim Wasinger, senior in accounting, said he registered but added he believes being forced to do something is not right.

"I registered just to be legal about it. I don't like committing my life or being in the position where I could lose it for a political war or unjust cause," Wasinger said.

If the country were faced with a direct threat to its welfare and citizens, Wasinger said he "wouldn't hesitate to go."

Colin Rankin, freshman in agriculture, agreed that he would also fight under the conditions Wasinger described.

"If we were involved in a war, I would be willing to go," Rankin said. "I feel the United States is the best country on the Earth and I would want to protect it from whatever the threat may be."

The area was east of the drilling site in the Hibernia field where the storm capsized the $120 million Ocean Ranger Monday morning.

Mobil Oil Canada Ltd., which leased the Japanese-built rig from a Louisiana company, said the crew included 15 Americans, 52 Newfoundlanders, 16 men from other parts of Canada and one Briton.

It was the second highest toll in the history of offshore drilling, exceeded only by the loss of 123 men in the capsizing of the rig Alexander Kielland in the North Sea on March 27, 1980.

IN PROVIDENCE, R.I., a Coast Guard commander who two years ago inspected the Ocean Ranger said another routine inspection was two months overdue.

Lt. Cmdr. Ronald Edmiston, the head of the Marine Safety Office at Providence, told The Associated Press that the Coast Guard asked his office to conduct the inspection last week but had been unable to do so until now because of a staff shortage and scheduling problems.

"They called about 10 days ago asking for the inspection and we were able to set it up for this week," Edmiston said in a separate interview on NBC's "Today" show. "Our inspectors were en route yesterday morning when we heard of the accident."

Edmiston was one of those who inspected the Ocean Ranger in December, 1979, at Jamestown, R.I., and found it in good working order.

He said an inspection is required every two years and it is the responsibility of the company to notify the Coast Guard when the certificate is expiring and ask for an inspection.

The self-propelled Ocean Ranger was built in Japan six years ago and had a rectangular platform 398 feet long and 262 feet wide. It was 337 feet from the top of the derrick to the pontoons 50 to 80 feet below the surface which kept it afloat.

Nooner

a Fleetwood Mac recording, "Never Going Back."

Stephanie Stewart, junior in general, followed with Don McLean's "Starry Starry Night," a song about painter Vincent Van Gogh.

The quiet mood was changed again with Dan Quinn, sophomore in history, playing ragtime on the upright piano.

"Ragtime is fantastic because if you play the piano you can make as many mistakes as you want and it still sounds like music," he warned the audience while flexing his fingers to begin. Quinn played "The Entertainer" by Marvin Hamlisch.

"I didn't want to rehearse a whole lot because that would ruin the fun of it." Tucker

Tucker came to the stage for the next song. Carrie Cott, sophomore in general, sang along with his guitar accompaniment, a haunting number Tucker wrote two years ago.

Cott returned with Patrick Powell, junior in electrical engineering, to join Kahn and Tucker on Dan Fogelberg's "Dancing Shoes."

The final song of the Nooner was a solo by Tucker. He did a Margie Adams tune "The Unicorn." Finishing to applause, Tucker motioned to his group of friends sitting near the stage.

"Come on up, take a bow," he urged. As they sat unmoving, he turned to the audience.

"Some friends."

After the call... Friends congratulate Bill Rogenmoser after he received the telephone call confirming his election as student body president last night.

Rogenmoser takes office by 400 votes

By LESLIE PHELPS
Government Affairs Editor

In a surprise victory, Bill Rogenmoser, senior in secondary science education, won the run-off student body presidential election Wednesday against Scott Long, junior in journalism and mass communications.

Rogenmoser, who received 594 votes in the general election, more than doubled his support in the run-off and received 1218 votes (59.3 percent). Long, who was the leader in the general election with 874 votes, lost support in the run-off and ended up with 837 votes (40.7 percent).

It has been eight years since the second runner-up in the general election has won in the run-off election. In that election race (1974-75), Maggie Vargas received the most votes in the general election and Mark Edelman came in second. In the run-off, Edelman won.

THERE WERE total of 2070 votes cast in the run-off election. Only 2055 votes counted, said Gayla Backman, elections committee chairman and senior in home economics education. She explained that 15 invalid ballots were either write-ins or were mismarked.

"We did it, we did it, we won!," yelled Rogenmoser when he received the news from the elections committee chairman over the phone.

"I'm student body president...I might be here forever," Rogenmoser said. He kept repeating over and over, "I can't believe it."

Long said, "I think he'll do a helluva job. I think he's very sincere."

ROGENMOSER WAS surprised when he heard of the large voting margin and yelled to his supporters, "We doubled it (the vote), we showed them who was boss!"

Rogenmoser said the first thing he would do in the morning would be to "pinch myself and make sure it's not a dream."

He jokingly told his supporters, "I'll be sure to get a date out of this."

The run-off election totals were tabulated quickly by computer and the candidates knew by 8 p.m. who the winner was.

The judges for the run-off were Dave Adams, director of Student Publications; Pat Bosco, assistant vice president of student affairs; and Margaret Nordin, associate director of student development, Backman said.

AT LEAST one judge was present when the ballots were being moved from the voting locations to the computer center, Backman said. The judges most important function is to "validate the ballots," she said.

The ballots are run through the computer and punched. The ones that a.en't marked correctly are rejected by the computer, Backman said. The elections committee and the judges examine the unpunched ballots and re-mark the ones not punched the first time, Backman said. Then, these ballots are run through the computer to be punched. After that, all the valid ballots are run through a second time, which is when the total voter printout is compiled, she said.

Only one more regulation must be followed by the two candidates in order for their candidacy to be valid. By 8 a.m. today, both run-off candidates must have turned in their last campaign expenditure report or their candidacy will be declared invalid by the elections committee.

Budget may bankrupt education: Regents

TOPEKA (AP) — Despite the dramatic pleas of regents and university officials, the chairmen of the House and Senate Ways and Means Committees said Wednesday they doubt there is legislative support for 13 percent faculty salary increases.

The officials testified before a joint meeting of the committees Wednesday asking lawmakers to provide more money for salaries. Gov. John Carlin, in his budget recommendation, trimmed the regent's 13 percent request.

Regents officials painted a bleak outlook for the quality of higher education in Kansas if budget cuts were allowed, but the committee chairmen said they were not moved by the presentations.

When contacted by the Collegian President Duane Acker said, "We simply emphasized that the 13 percent faculty salary increase was needed. Our role was to speak on behalf of the regents system." Acker also said he believed the testimony had a tremendous impact on the legislators.

"The bottom line is that this year is a critical year in the future of higher education," said Regent Frank Lowman, of Hays. "If we don't get the proper response to our OOE (other operating expenditures) problems and faculty salaries it is possible to bankrupt higher education in Kansas."

Lowman said that years of strong financial support for higher education would be wasted if the Legislature approved Carlin's recommendations. Carlin cut the regents faculty salary increase request from 13 to 8.75 percent, while adding a possible additional 1.25 percent merit raise. Carlin also cut the board's OOE request from 11 percent to 6 percent.

"You'll still have the brick and mortar, and you'll still have warm bodies in the classrooms but you won't have the quality that we have now and without quality the system is bankrupt," Lowman said.

ACKER SAID Lowman's testimony was good. He said, too, that several informative questions were asked of those testifying.

But the chairmen of the committees, Sen. Paul Hess, (R-Wichita), and Rep. Mike Hayden, (R-Atwood), disagreed with Lowman's forecast of doom and said they

House approves 'mind control' bill; parents could get custody rights

TOPEKA, Kan. (AP) — The Kansas House overwhelmingly passed a bill Wednesday designed to allow parents to remove their children from religious "cult" groups for possible deprogramming.

The so-called "mind control" measure was approved, 98-27, and now goes to the Senate.

If it is enacted, Kansas could become the first state in the nation to give parents a clear right to retrieve their children for mental evaluations and deprogramming.

Despite the lopsided vote in support of the bill, several House members said they had to vote against it — although they sympathized with the goal — because they fear it is an infringement on religious freedom and is unconstitutional.

Foes argued during House floor debate Tuesday that the deprogramming bill faced a certain court challenge over its constitutionality.

Others argued that the Legislature should attempt such a bill and let the courts decide the issue of whether families should have some legal help in reclaiming their members from alleged "mind control" by religious groups.

Ahead of the vote, a young man identifying himself as Lowell E. Mitchem handed out packets of information to House members.

Mitchem said he recently came to Kansas as state director of the Unification Church, one of the groups at which the bill is aimed.

"This bill constitutes a potential threat to the unrestrained practice of our religious freedom as defined by the 1st Amendment," Mitchem said in a statement included in the packet.

Rep. Joe Knopp (D-Manhattan) sponsored the bill and had it drafted at the request of Frank Tillman, chairman of the industrial engineering department at Kansas State University.

Last April, Tillman's 19-year-old daughter joined a Florida-based religious group while she was a student at K-State. Concerned about changes in their daughter's behavior, her parents "kidnapped" her last September and took her to a farmhouse in central Kansas to be deprogrammed of her religious beliefs by a psychologist.

The bill, as approved, allows parents or guardians to take their children from a religious group for 30 days if they obtain a court order. During that time, a hearing would be held to determine whether the person was capable of making decisions on their own or needed psychological treatment or deprogramming.

Police call Kramer incident attempt to rape employee

An incident involving a female Kramer Food Center employee has been classified as an attempted rape, according to Art Stone, director of Security and Traffic.

At 7 a.m. Tuesday, the woman was changing clothes in the women's locker room at Kramer Food Center when a white male entered the room and exposed himself.

The woman screamed and the man approached her and said, "don't scream." The woman screamed again and after hearing a door slam outside the room the man fled, Stone said.

There was no physical contact made, but after Security and Traffic officers reviewed the case it was determined that the man had moved toward the woman and was then classified as an attempted rape. The incident was originally classified as a case of indecent exposure, Stone said.

"We felt there was more than just an intent to shock the woman," Stone said. "On an indecent exposure (case), the individual will turn for the initial shock and will normally flee after hearing a scream."

Stone said that since the man did not flee after the first scream, a judgment was made by the department that there was more than an attempt to shock the woman.

Security and Traffic has a general description of the man, and the department is investigating the incident at the present time, Stone said.

There were no known witnesses to the incident, but Security and Traffic is trying to find out who might have been entering the building at the time it occurred.

"We play it as we see it," he said. "We can't read intent into an individual's mind."

KU football players charged in burglary, theft

LAWRENCE — Three University of Kansas football players were charged with burglary and felony theft Wednesday for burglaries at a dormitory and an off-campus residence.

Douglas County District Attorney Mike Malone said Broderick Thompson, 21, of Cerritos, Calif., Renwick Atkins, 19, of Chicago, and Cedric Alexander of Chicago, were released on bonds of $2,500 each pending hearings next month.

KU Coach Don Fambrough said he could not discuss the players' status. "As soon as we know all the facts and the legal system has run its course, we will have a statement concerning the future status of those people involved," Fambrough said.

Malone said the three players learned of outstanding warrants against them and appeared voluntarily in Douglas County District Court Wednesday. Authorities said about $6,000 worth of stolen property, including stereo equipment, was recovered.

Authorities said Atkins and Thompson were accused of burglarizing separate apartments in Jayhawker Towers, an apartment complex where the three athletes live. Those two burglaries reportedly occurred last Christmas. Alexander was charged in connection with the burglary of an off-campus residence Feb. 9.

Funds run out on undercover drug operation

CHANUTE — Operation Sleepy Eye, an undercover drug operation in southeastern Kansas, went out of business this month when its government funding ran out, a former official of the unit said Wednesday.

Terry Steinert, former No. 2 man in the Southeast Kansas Narcotics Unit, said the drug operation "took off the street in excess of $3 million worth of drugs" in the five raids it made during the past three years.

The undercover operations were financed by federal, state, county and local funding, he said.

Steinert, now a Neosho County deputy, said eight arrests were made last week in the final raid. He said the arrests resulted in charges of sale of LSD, marijuana and phenobarbital. Three warrants remained outstanding Wednesday, he said.

The last phase of Operation Sleepy Eye was conducted with the help of the Coffey and Montgomery county sheriff's offices and police in Fort Scott and Independence, he said.

Steinert said he planned to keep information on drug traffic in southeastern Kansas up-to-date and would work with the Kansas Bureau of Investigation and FBI.

Employer burns gourmet fugitive 'con man'

RIFLE, Colo. — The "wanted" poster described fugitive Richard Aaron Carter as a gourmet cook, and that proved to be his undoing — it led police right to the kitchen of the Red River Saloon.

Carter, a six-time convicted felon with a reputation for making a great cheesecake, had been sought by authorities since his June 1981 escape from a Denver halfway house.

Last week, the Denver District Attorney's office mailed 300 wanted posters to resort restaurants in Colorado and Wyoming.

When one arrived with Saturday's mail at the Red River Saloon in Rifle, co-owner Art Sayles said he was startled to learn that "one of the best kitchen managers I've ever encountered" was a convicted thief on the lam.

"The poster listed his occupation as 'chef-con man.' I looked at the picture and knew right away it was him," said Sayles, who called police. "When he reported for work Saturday night, he was arrested."

Carter, 46, was being held Wednesday in the Denver County Jail. He declined to discuss the pending charges with authorities, but he did divulge some of his culinary secrets.

Director says rural phone rates could double

TOPEKA — Kansas customers of United Telephone Co. can expect their local telephone rates to at least double within the next two years, a company spokesman said Wednesday.

David Lewis, United Telephone director of government relations, told the House Energy and Natural Resources Committee the local rate increases will be needed to replace lost revenue to United Telephone because of deregulation within the telecommunications industry.

United Telephone serves 109 mostly rural communities in Kansas and has 110,000 customers. Major cities served by United Telephone include Junction City, Hiawatha, Garnett and Russell.

United Telephone expects its average current monthly residental rate of $4.86 to increase to at least $14.75, or 203 percent and business rates from $8.75 to $18.64, or 111 percent.

The projections made by United Telephone are similar to those made by Southwestern Bell Telephone Co. when it appeared before the same committee last week. However, rate increases for United Telephone might be higher on a percentage basis since because its telephone service is essentially provided to rural customers, Lewis said.

A travelers advisory is again in effect for the area with dense fog and occasional light drizzle. Fog will lift with skies becoming partly cloudy this afternoon. Highs 45 to 50.

Natural gas price is legislative issue

Thousands of natural gas consumers faced the reality of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 when they registered the amount due on this winter month's gas bill. The tremendous jump in prices is a result of deregulation of natural gas. Federal gas price controls are scheduled to be eased out over the next three years, unless President Reagan can speed up this action, a likely possibility.

The former "cheap and clean" fuel is still considerably less expensive than other fuels but pressures are coming from the administration, the legislature and industry which may quickly remove this title from the natural gas product.

Kansas House Democrats have introduced a resolution, according to the Associated Press, calling for a freeze of natural gas prices at current levels and any further decontrol. The Kansas Democrats feel that because there is currently an abundant supply of gas the higher prices are being "artificially inflated." However, according to a Feburary newletter from Governor John Carlin, present legislation prohibits natural gas utility use after 1990. This has resulted in the need for new plants, and construction costs have also increased utility bills.

The suggested Democratic policy has few chances of gaining any leverage with the federal government. The deregulation of gas prices stands to benefit some. Industrial users favor accelerated decontrol of all gas, according to the Wall Street Journal, because residential customers will be equally sharing in the cost. The Natural Gas Policy Act currently contains an "incremental pricing" clause which results in industrial customers paying for a major percentage of price increases. In their view, this is a forced subsidization of home natural gas consumers.

Others feel higher prices will encouraged further exploration thus avoiding any future shortage. All points have substantiation but the initial results stay the same. Higher gas bills that many consumers can not afford to pay. Unlike other consumer products, heat is a necessity that can not be budgeted out. In this record-low winter, efforts to lower a bill to its former amount are life threatening if not impossible.

Consumers of natural gas are faced with an issue that has few viable alternatives of action. Govenor Carlin stated one of the more effective in his newsletter.

"I urge all Kansans to let their representatives in Congress and the White House know that their actions on pending federal legislation can either keep utility bills from increasing any further or send them literally through the roof."

Life's foul plays

Sudden death. Though challenging and exciting in a sporting event, sudden death can be devastating — the devastation of knowing that you will never again see a loved one.

Losing a grandmother is not like losing a dog or a cat, and it's surely not like losing a football game. It's like having an incredibly hot iron pierce your stomach and burn there for days.

The first reaction is disbelief — it can't be true. She was such a vital, alive person. She was infallible. She wasn't going to die until she was good and ready.

I guess she was ready.

I'm not certain what force is moving my fingers across these keys, Oma (the name we used for my father's mother) died more than two years ago. It seems so useless.

IT WAS RAINING outside when the call came, the cold, sad rain of a late October morning. Oma was dead. It couldn't be. All the thoughts of anger and denial rushed through my head at once. I was dizzy with grief. I was irrational.

There was a shoulder for me to cry on but even that didn't stop the rain. My dad's mother — on his birthday. God, how could you take her? She was such a beautiful woman. She was my Oma.

Classes seemed to blend together as I struggled to maintain. I knew that I wouldn't make the funeral as it would be in Orlando, Fla. That enhanced the guilt — even my brother would fly in from overseas to be with the family.

I spoke to my father that night, to let him know that though my thoughts were with him, I couldn't be. The words wouldn't come as there was nothing to say. Oma was dead, and all the words in the dictionary would not bring her back. In quiet desperation I wished my father a happy birthday.

I think that's the only time I've heard my father cry.

THE DAY of the funeral I drove for hours. I found myself at the top of Manhattan hill on top of the rocks. I sat there in my temple of grief and let the wind cut through me. Wherever I was, I wasn't where I wanted to be.

Death is an incredible cheat. It cheats you out of all the joy and wonder of those you love. It cheated me out of the most delicious cheese cake I'd ever want, the softest lullaby, the most beautiful Oma. But when death cheats, there's no retribution. The game is finished.

I started to rationalize what had happened. Oma had suffered a stroke which probably caused severe brain damage. The woman I loved was dead before her biological functions got the message.

She had led a hard life. She endured the war, raised children, lived in New York, played with her grandchildren. Perhaps a woman who had worked hard her whole life deserved a rest. Perhaps this was the only way she would get it.

Perhaps I was trying to justify something that was incredibly unfair.

The rush of childhood memories washed in as the tears flowed out. What would become of the seashells we had played with? Would the family members remove their shoes to enter her living room? Would the orange trees die of loneliness? Would I ever stop asking myself "what if?"

I TELL MYSELF that I could have taken it better had there been some warning, had I known she was ill. Instead, there was one phone call telling me she had had a stroke and, 24 hours later, another telling me it was all over.

I hate that. It's all over. It's time to hit the showers, the players to hit the locker room.

My father wonders why I worry so much about him and his heart condition — why I get angry when he goes into the hospital without telling me. In this way I think I'm no different than many of my friends.

Parents seem to have been placed on the Earth, "not to worry" their children. At least that's what they'd have you believe. There are countless stubborn adults, like my father, who believe that tests to determine the need for open heart surgery are "minor." Afterall, he said, "the tests were minor."

Death is not a minor sporting event that parents r children can play. When a team takes to the field, it wants to know exactly what it's up against and what the odds of winning are. Children are placed at a disadvantage when parents choose to conceal game statistics.

It is admirable, nay parental, to want to keep loved ones from worrying needlessly. Yet it is crucial that children know and face the sadness in the world that confronts them. In order to deal with family crises, the dealer must have the full deck, jokers and all.

When sudden death becomes unavoidable, it's time to look at the rules of the game. There is no overtime in life, there is no fifth down.

Excessive wet weather reveals damaged roofs

By CHARLENE FARRELL
Staff Writer

Many faculty and staff have found something besides garbage to put in their trash cans — water.

"The building (King Hall) is leaking like a sieve," Maarten Van Swaay, associate professor of chemistry, said.

Though the administration is sympathetic with those who are contending with drops, splashes and falling ceiling panels due to water damage in King Hall, their problem isn't unique to the University.

According to Fred Ferguson, director of building utilities, University Facilities, there is a waiting list of buildings that need roof repairs.

"Emergency funds are being requested for a couple of the buildings," he said. At the top of the list is Weber Hall, and close behind is Seaton Hall.

Apparently the roof above the Seaton library is "a convenient place to 'run around,'" Ferguson said. There is evidence of a lot of "foot traffic" on the roof which has caused large holes.

THE STUDY environment in the browsing section of Farrell Library may be comparable to the annoying drip of a leaky water faucet. Trash cans have been scattered about in an attempt to catch the water leaking through the roof, staining floors and ruining carpets in the browsing section and lobby.

The entire lobby roof needs resurfacing, Ferguson said, and money has been allocated by the legislature to fix it. Currently the University is trying to finalize bids on the contract.

Reroofing the library lobby should take care of the major water problem, he said, but there are still areas in the library where a minor drip may cause damage to books.

"There is a series of leaks every time there is snow on the roof," Brice Hobrock, dean of the library said. The worst place is on the eighth level of the old building stacks, where the ceiling is resting on the top of the book stacks.

"There's no danger to people," Hobrock said, because the area is locked and is used as storage for books that are no longer of use to K-State.

IF A BUILDING shows a need for complete reroofing, the University must obtain the money from the state. Money for minor patching must come from the University budget, according to Ferguson.

The University requested $120,000 for the resurfacing of the Natatorium roof and for parts of Ahearn Field House, but the final bid on the contract was $95,000. Work will begin in March, Ferguson said.

The process of pinpointing leaks has improved in recent years with the use of a neutron roof moisture meter, Ferguson said. The meter makes a scanning map of the roof and easily locates the leaks, he said.

Even with the moisture meter, occupants of these buildings may need to get used to the trashcan maze.

"The time (of year) we need the roofs the most is the time (of year) they can't be fixed," Ferguson said.

In order for patching or resurfacing to be effective, it must be done in dry weather, Ferguson said. This means waiting until spring, and if it's a wet spring the wait may last into the summer, he said.

Police raids snag violators in two-day Polish 'dragnet'

WARSAW, Poland (AP) — Thousands of Polish police, many striking at night, launched the biggest nationwide dragnet since martial law was imposed in Poland and detained 3,500 people for violating military regulations, officials said Wednesday.

The official news agency PAP said 25,000 regular and volunteer policemen took part in the 48-hour sweep, but did not say when it was completed.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Dean Fischer called the detentions "deeply upsetting," and said they made "a mockery of all recent Polish government statements to the effect that life is beginning to return to normal in Poland."

In another development, Radio Warsaw monitored in Vienna criticized Poland's Roman Catholic Church, saying some priests were acting "irresponsibly" by criticizing internment camps and other martial law measures.

In its report of the mass roundups, PAP said that in addition to the 3,500 detained another 7,000 were fined for martial law violations.

PAP said 145,000 people were warned, 29,000 lectured, and 4,000 sent to misdemeanor courts, and that 614 people still face police courts for martial law violations uncovered during the recent two-day sweep called "Operation Calm."

PAP said police checked 51,000 shops, 60,000 vehicles and 3,500 hideouts for "criminal elements," adding: "It can be stated on the basis of reports of police patrols that the state of obedience to existing regulations of martial law is not the best."

The latest report indicated that all or some restrictions of martial law such as a ban on inter-city travel without permission, or a ban on possession of passports, may not be lifted as promised by the authorities last month.

New off-campus president seeks to organize students

Officers for the Off-Campus Student Association (OCSA) Council were elected Monday night by its seven newly elected members.

The job of the council will be to organize the 10,000 off-campus students so they can be a functional group, said Gene Russell, past OCSA president and junior in industrial engineering.

Ron Bragdon, junior in life sciences, was elected president by the council. Charles Knight, sophomore in industrial engineering will be vice president; Linda Consigli, junior in general, will be secretary; and Dean Rossi, freshman in agriculture, will be treasurer.

"I think it sounds like a lot will be accomplished. We have a lot of people that will work hard at it, but we need support," Consigli said.

Larry Wood, junior in agronomy; Kathel Miller, junior in home economics; and Jana Linenberger, sophomore in accounting; will serve as council members. These students work with the council officers in helping to make the organization work, Russell said.

The first responsibility of the council is to prepare a 1982-83 school year budget, Russell said. This year, the association is requesting $1,500 from the finance committee, the largest budget in the history of its existence.

The council wants to print two newsletters each semester — one to distribute at registration and one to distribute later in the semester, Wood said.

"We need the finances to do this and the $400 we were allotted last year just doesn't get the job done," he said.

"The council has a lot of new ideas and is really eager to get their feet wet — let their imagination run wild — but they need the money to communicate their ideas," Russell said.

The proposed budget increase (from $400 to $1,500) will allow for more advertising which will help to communicate with off-campus students, Russell said.

"We need to run more ads and try to communicate with the 10,000 off-campus students and let them know who we are," Wood said. "We somehow need to get in touch with more people."

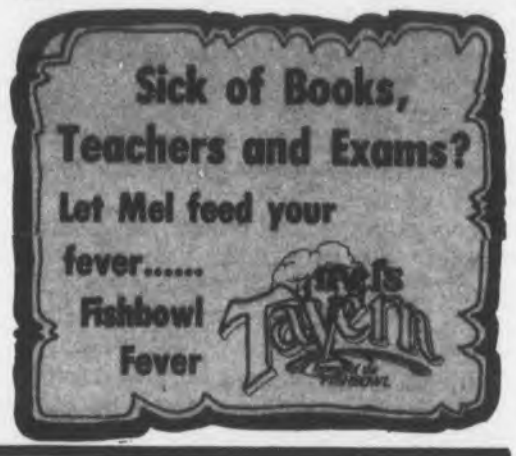
The council will be meeting with Bill Ogg, council sponsor and instructor in student development, regularly this semester to try to reach its goals, Russell said.

Senate to take office, may discuss ticket plan

The last meeting of the 1981-82 Student Senate and the first meeting of the newly elected senators will take place tonight.

Establishing a student government committee that would handle student basketball ticket lines will also be discussed.

At the present time, ticket lines are formed first-come first-served, said Doug Dodds, senate chairman and senior in political science. If adopted, the resolution will establish a basketball ticket committee to decide how ticket lines will be formed and what rules will govern these lines, he said.



The Intercollegiate Athletic Council will have to approve the program set up by the student government committee before any action can be taken, Dodds said. Possibly in the future, some sort of committee will be set up to govern the non-reserved ticket lines before each game, but it will not be discussed at this meeting, he said.

In addition, approval of the FONE assistant coordinator will be voted on. Katie Andre, junior in pre-veterinary medicine, is under consideration for the position.

The 1982-83 term senators and student body president will be sworn in at tonight's meeting. The swearing in of the new senators is the final stamp of approval, Dodds said. Senate has to vote on approving the new senators, student body president and the election process, he said.

The first duty of the new senators is to nominate a senate chairman to preside over senate meetings, Dodds said.

Certificates of recognition will be given to all past senators. The certificate states the student has finished a full term as a student senator and is also in appreciation of the work accomplished by the senators, Dodds said.

Cigarette tax ignites debate

TOPEKA (AP) — Several legislators sat smoking cigarettes or puffing pipes Wednesday as they attentively listened to two colleagues wanting to raise the state taxes they would pay on tobacco products.

The measures, heard by the House Assessment and Taxation Committee, would increase the cigarette tax from the current 11 cents on a 20-cigarette package upwards to either 13 cents or 20 cents respectively.

With a 20 cents a package tax, Mankato Republican Rep. Keith Roe said his bill would add an additional $25.8 million to the state's general fund.

Rep. Rochelle Chronister, (R-Neodesha), wants a two cent increase to 13 cents a pack which would raise $6.4 million. Her proposal, however, specifies how the additional revenue would be used.

She wants $2.5 million given to county health departments and $500,000 to establish competitive grants for bio-medical research at the state's higher education institution. The remaining $3 million plus would go directly to the state general fund.

Representatives of the tobacco industry made clear their objections to any tax increases on tobacco products.

"When you put a tax on some people who get no special benefit from it, the tax is patently inequitable," said Paul Coleman, a lobbyist for the Kansas Tobacco-Candy Distributors and Vendors.

Coleman predicted increasing the cigarette tax might cause Kansans to buy their cigarettes in neighboring states. And while there, he added, they probably would make other outof-state purchases which could hurt Kansas retailers.

The current cigarette tax for neighboring states is: Oklahoma, 18 cents; Nebraska, 14 cents; Colorado, 10 cents; and Missouri, 9 cents.

This week, the Missouri House of Representatives easily a passed a bill which would increase their cigarette tax up to 16 cents per pack. Missouri cities also have the option of adding on additional cents for municipal purposes.

Kansas last increased its cigarette tax in 1970.

What concerns the tobacco lobbyists is that the estimated 605,000 smokers in Kansas will purchase fewer cigarettes if the tax is increased.

No action was taken on the bills by the committee.

Cowboys shootdown 'Cats again

Doin' the splits...K-State's Lafayette Watkins and Oklahoma State's Matt Clark scramble for a loose ball during second-half action. Oklahoma gained control of the ball, and went on to dominate the game, winning 72-62.

By HOWARD RICHMAN
Sports Writer

Oklahoma State invaded Manhattan Wednesday night seeking a victory to boost its chances of a home court advantage in the first round of the Big Eight Post Season tournament.

At the same time, K-State was aiming to avenge a loss in January to the Cowboys.

When the final buzzer sounded, the Wildcats could not taste sweet revenge. Instead, the visitors from Stillwater improved their hopes with a 72-62 win at Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats, 7-4, stand second in the conference with three games remaining.

Oklahoma State, 6-5 in the league, moved into a three-way tie for third place with Oklahoma and Nebraska. Missouri is the only team that has assured itself a home court berth in post season.

K-STATE HEAD COACH Jack Hartman said his team needs to show improvement offensively.

"We've been struggling for quite a while now. We need to become more agressively offensively. We've been to tentative," Hartman said.

Tyrone Adams led the 'Cats in scoring with 22 points. Les Craft was the only other Wildcat in double figures with 12.

Oklahoma State was paced in the scoring column by Matt Clark's 17 points. Leroy Combs contributed 16 to the winning cause. The Cowboys shot 47 percent in the first half, but heated up to a blistering 80 percent in the last half.

Head Coach Paul Hansen said his teams play in the final half was the best possible.

"This was as good as we could play, especially in the second half. We got into our transition game, hit some free throws and did the things needed to win against a team like K-State," Hansen said.

IN THE FIRST HALF, K-State jumped to a 4-0 lead on baskets by Craft and Tim Jankovich. Oklahoma State didn't break the ice until Ricky Jacobs hit a jumper four minutes into the contest.

The game stayed close as the 'Cats got baskets from Adams and Randy Reed. Combs kept pace by throwing in six points which cut K-State's lead to 11-10.

Combs later jammed home an alleyoop pass from Eddie Hannon cutting the margin to 15-14.

Herb Brown seeks job as Arizona head coach

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Former pro basketball coach Herb Brown says he's bored and needs some pressure and that's why he's hoping he'll win the University of Arizona post for which he's to be interviewed on Thursday.

And the new boss of Ben Lindsey, the other coach who will talk with Arizona officials Thursday, says Lindsey will be free to go if he gets the job.

Lindsey, 42, and Brown, 43, are among 65 candidates for the post Fred Snowden is to vacate in June. Snowden, whose Wildcats have been losing most of this season, is to become an assistant to Arizona Athletic Director David Strack temporarily but is expected to seek a coaching post elsewhere.

Brown, who spent two years at C.W. Post in Greenvale, N.Y., and a year coaching a team in Israel before joining the Detroit Pistons, said he was delighted to find he had "gone from dark horse to contender."

"You know what I'm missing in my life right now°" Brown said after word of the interview schedule became public Tuesday.

"Pressure," he answered himself. "I'm bored. The UA job is a challenge. It's a pressure situation, and I'd like to get it, because I can do the job."

He said he never saw himself as a pro coach when he was growing up and that he "always enjoyed college coaching the most" in his 20 years at the helm of more than 600 games.

"I have no desire whatsoever to ever coach in the pros again," he added. "If I'm fortunate enough to get the UA job, I would hope it would be the last coaching job I'll ever have."

Neither Brown, who lives in Tucson, nor Lindsey, who resides in Phoenix, is coaching now.

Lindsey recently signed up with Fort Hays State University in Kansas, but Fort Hays Athletic Director Tom Stromgren said Lindsey had made his Arizona interest known in accepting the Kansas post.

Stromgren said Fort Hays would release Lindsey if Arizona wants him, but that he still felt he had hired the best basketball coach in the nation in hiring Lindsey.

And Lindsey said he has a special interest in the Arizona job because he was born and raised in Arizona.

He has been on a year's leave of absence from Grand Canyon College in Phoenix to serve as a consultant to the Philippines national team.

With the Antelopes, Lindsey had a 340-134 record that included two National Association of Intercollegiate Athletics titles.

consecutive points to take a 23-14 lead. Craft tallied six of the points in the spurt.

With K-State leading 25-16, Oklahoma State proceeded to make a run of its own by scoring the next six points.

The 'Cats led 26-22 before the Cowboys' Kim Shahan nailed a 20-footer making the score 26-24 with 1:38 remaining in the half.

THE VISITORS had a chance to tie the game prior to the half's end, but Shahan's misdirected jumper ended seconds later in a K-State layup to end the half.

The Cowboys started quickly in the second half as they took a 29-28 lead after a three-point play by Combs. Combs followed seconds later with two charity tosses extending the margin to 31-28.

A Clark slam dunk widened the gap to 35-30 before the Wildcats attempted another rally. Baskets by Adams and Jankovich narrowed the score to 35-34 with 16 minutes left on the clock.

After Jacobs hit a jump shot, Clark went to work again. His two buckets made the score 41-34. Clark canned two free throws followed by a Hannon jumper making the tally 46-36 with 10:41 to go. The two combined to hit four free shots and kept the lead at 10, 50-40.

K-STATE used baskets by Ed Nealy and Lafayette Watkins to cut the lead to eight, 52-44 with eight minutes left in the game. The 'Cats could not get any closer than eight until Adams hit a shot with 2:18 left making the count 59-52.

With Oklahoma State leading 62-54, Adams came through again as the 'Cats pulled within six, 62-56.

But the Cowboys netted some points of their own as Raymond Crenshaw connected on two free throws and Joe Atkinson's layup put the Cowboys on top 66-56 with 51 seconds to go.

Ed Galvao tossed in two buckets in the waning seconds for K-State to put the differential at 68-62. Lorenza Andrews and Clark iced the game for the Cowboys with four more free throws to close out the scoring.

did not see need for the regent-recommended increases.

"I think faculty will do relatively well, probably better than everyone else, but that is probably little solace to professors who think they deserve a 13 percent raise," Hess said.

"We're not going to give them a game of mirrors like the governor has," Hess said, referring to Carlin's juggling of faculty salary increases based on faculty turnover percentages.

Hayden said he agreed with Hess' belief that faculty salaries will not reach the regent-recommended level.

"I don't find any impetus to increase the governor's recommendations," Hayden said.

Hess added: "This 10 percent business is a lot of hogwash. I think they are going to get somewhere between 8 and 9 percent without any mandatory earmarking."

Hess said the appropriations would probably include 1 percent aimed at addressing salary needs in "high pressure areas." He also said he thinks university administrators should be able to spread funds where they feel there is a serious need.

"I would rather give as much flexibility as I can to the presidents and chancellors and say 'do what you want with it but be able to account for it'," Hess said.

Carlin's recommendation of 6 percent for OOE will not be cut further, Hess said.

"Basically what we're going to do is take the governor's dollars, reshuffle the deck and try and do a little better job of it," Hess said. He said classified employees, like all state employees, will receive about an 8 percent increase.

"I can't find a lot to disagree with in the Senator's comments," Hayden said. "However, I don't think the governor's approach will address the high-need areas adequately."

Hayden said he believed university administrators were given too much freedom to dole money intended for special use in engineering, accounting and computer science areas. They are considered "high pressure areas" and special funds have been allocated to secure quality instructors in those fields.

Sniper kills 3 in California

CHULA VISTA, Calif. (AP) — Three people were killed and at least three others, including a deputy, were wounded Wednesday by a sniper firing a variety of weapons in a trailer park. One man was taken into custody more than four hours after the shooting began, sheriff's deputies said.

San Diego County Sheriff's Department Sgt. Chuck Curtis confirmed the three deaths but said he was uncertain about the exact number of wounded, other than the deputy.

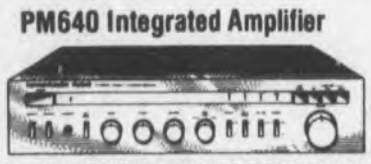
Sheriff's spokesman John Duffy said the deputy had been hit in the base of the neck and was reported in serious condition at a hospital.

At least 19 shots were fired from a shotgun, a rifle and a small-caliber pistol, Duffy said.

The man taken into custody about 6:15 p.m. was taken to Bay General Community Hospital in Chula Vista, where doctors said they were too busy to elaborate on his injuries. Dallas Johnson, 27, a member of the San Diego Paramedics, said the man, in his 50s, did not appear to be seriously wounded.

Just before 5 p.m., officers laid down a smoke screen, then advanced behind it with an armored van to remove a woman's body from a driveway at the Mountain View Mobile Lodge.

Then, officers began lobbing tear gas canisters inside a trailer they believed the gunman was using.



Deputy Robert Brown, 34, was hit in the neck and was listed in serious condition at Bay General where he underwent surgery, Duffy said.

Deputy Linda Harmuth was credited with saving Brown's life by dragging him to safety after he was hit by a .22-caliber bullet at the base of the throat, Duffy said. She had answered the initial call with Brown, Duffy said.

Research in plastic... John Graham, graduate in chemistry, prepares a sample for use in a machine to test the durability of plastics. Graham is an assistant for Professor Fateley's plastic research project.

Former student solves plastic testing mystery

By DOUG WARD
Collegian Reporter

A little bit of luck and imagination can go a long way. Just ask David Honigs.

Honigs came to William Fateley, professor of chemistry, for undergraduate advising in August 1979. He ended up with a job cleaning and painting the professor's office and eventually solved a technical computer process that had plagued Fateley for years.

His association with Fateley led him to work on a problem in a plastic testing technique using a computer and computer programs designed by Fateley.

"I just got lucky," Honigs said. "The biggest problem was with the computer overheating which prevented it from running."

THE CONCEPT behind the experiment is to test the durability of plastics to determine how they can redesigned, Fateley said. By gathering information about the molecular structure of different polymers a determination can be made as to why they break.

Because precision is essential, the process uses a laser clock which feeds into a computer which controls two jaw-clamps. A sheet of plastic film held in the clamps is stretched 1 to 5 percent of its original width, he explained.

"We stretch the plastic 10 to 100,000 times until it breaks," Fateley said. "It is our wish to see what went wrong with the plastics and find why they break."

As the plastic is stretched, infrared radiation is sent through it and readings are taken by a detecting device. The information is then sent back to the computer which collects and interprets the data. Spectrum readings are also taken on an oscilloscope so a "fingerprint" of the molecular structure can be seen and further interpreted. The entire process takes about six hours, Fateley said.

FATELY HAS FOUND that the oxygen in the air crowds in and breaks down the molecules of the plastics. He described the process as being similar to corrosion in metal.

The instruments used to study the molecules and to stretch the plastics were developed at K-State, according to Fateley.

Plastics

Fateley's work began in 1977 on development of the equipment after receiving a four-year, $100,000 grant from the Air Force Office of Scientific Research (AFOSR).

After proving the process was successful at diagnosing the breakdown reactions in plastics, Fateley submitted his concept to the National Science Foundation (NFS). He will receive a total of $220,000 from the NFS in addition to $35,000 from K-State and an undetermined amount from IBM. These funds will go towards continuing of his research.

Although Fately has received publicity for utilizing the technique, he still gives much of the credit to Honigs.

"I had worked with electrical circuits and had taken an intro to computers class," Honigs said, "but I solved the problems in this process with intuition and looking at it with logical sense."

Fateley said he has received calls from various industries and manufacturers, including a company that manufactures dentures for animals, that hope to benefit from the testing process.

MAKING BETTER products for the consumer is the whole idea behind research, Fateley said.

But his own curiosity about plastics has led him to set two broad goals.

"First, I hope to better understand why plastics break, and second, I want to better understand the chemical reactions that take place when they break," Fateley said.

Fateley worked five years in developing his current testing device and has spent more time on this project than any other single research project he has been involved in.

Hs results were published in the Journal of Polymer Science in 1981 and his techniques are being tested by Boston University, the University of Alabama and Northwestern University.

While Fateley continues his work at K-State, Honigs has moved on to Indiana University where he is currently working on his doctorate in spectroscopy.

"I received good recommendations from Professor Fateley," Honigs said, "and that helped me get a scholarship to Indiana."

Scanlan satisfied with term, but ready to leave

By TANYA BRANSON
Staff Writer

After Angela Scanlan leaves office, the next woman student body president will be elected in 2017. That is if the rate of one each 36 years remains the same. Scanlan is the second woman to hold the office of president. The first was Ethelinda Parrish in 1944. Parrish was selected to finish the term of the elected president who had been drafted.

"It's been an interesting office," Scanlan said. "There's been a lot of times I was on a committee where I was the only woman. If I hadn't been a woman and student body president then there wouldn't have been a woman represented. Sometimes there would have been no need, but other times there was."

Scanlan said while president she was more sensitive to the stereotypical roles placed on people, but although she encountered some difficulties, being a woman didn't cause any major problems.

"I'm not a hard-core feminist, but I think if you have the ability to do something than you should be able to do it," she said.

NO LONGER in the limelight, Scanlan said she is looking forward to "taking time for myself."

Her term ends tonight when newly-elected Bill Rogenmoser is installed at the senate meeting, but her year as president has taught her "a lot about myself and a lot about working with people."

Scanlan said that while in office she realized that student apathy is not a problem.

"It's an innate human trait that people don't care about an issue unless it's close to them," Scanlan said. "If there is an issue close to them, then they will support it. Different people have different priorities.

"Apathy is a trite word, I think it's better described as satisfaction in the status quo. If students aren't satisfied with something then they will let you know," she said.

THE ISSUE that students were the most interested in was the coliseum, Scanlan said, so it was what the senate did the most work on.

"Along with Doug Dodds and Mark Skinner, I have done a lot as far as formulating a workable proposal for the coliseum," she said. "It's been kicked around for five years, but now we have the support and a proposal that will work."

Other prevalent issues Scanlan said students are interested are lighting on campus and increases in parking permit fees.

Scanlan said the past year has been as positive one for her both as president and as chairman of the Student Advisory Committee.

"It's really exciting because everyone took an active part in the (coliseum) proposal. There has been a tremendous amount of involvement with this year's senate, more than the four years I have experienced in student government," she said. "Part was because the coliseum issue — people were excited and felt like they have accomplished something. But the leadership sets the tone and Doug Dodds made everyone have fun and like working together."

As chairman of the Student Advisory Committee, Scanlan said she believed its credibility was strengthened and it built better rapport with the Board of Regents. This has been helped by the change in philosophy of the Associated Students of Kansas. Now, Mark Tomlin, chairman, looks at ASK as a staff position to the Student Advisory Committee.

Scanlan leaves this advice for Bill Rogenmoser: "Realize that you've only got one year and you are not going to change the University or make a tremendous impact. But you can make a difference.

"It's a million-dollar job you'd never want to do again," she said.

U2's power playing music may lead to further success

By KENT HERMES
Collegian Reviewer

Repetitious guitar licks, droning vocals and redundant melody and drum lines can be sufficient grounds to dismiss any group's music. The problem is that many successful new bands can fit this mold.

Another problem is the younger modern groups have been charged with a lack of musicianship and crude, simplistic creativity in respect to melody and form.

The young power-pop group U2 walks this sometimes-thin line between self-indulging and turning out a quality product.

U2's single "I Will Follow" from its debut album "Boy" received some attention. Scattered air play and shy acceptance in areas remaining dominated by REO and other cream-of-the-mainstream has kept them at the edge of the spotlight.

The group's newest release, "October," expands little on the basic foundation of the first LP, but U2 has grown artistically and does two quality slower songs.

"Gloria" is all U2. It also may be better suited for FM play than their previous attempt. Heavy drums and sparkling guitar line make this tune work.

Its rhythmic clone "Rejoice" is preceeded by two fresh yet predictable songs. "I Threw a Brick Through the Windows" and "I Fall Down" reach deeper than the titles.

Much of the back side is preoccupied with creating a haunting effect, sometimes not relevant to anything. The lyrics drag on as they become less accessible.

The last cut, "Is That All," is a short, tense reminder of the early U2, leaves you wondering just that.

"October" is an album that grows on you after a listen or two. It keeps a certain freshness. While many of the power poppers have played their way into the woodwork, this group turns out a quality music form.

Ballet to debut Friday under lights at McCain

By PAM FITZSIMMONS
Collegian Reporter

An original ballet, "Cordelia," will make its debut Friday night in McCain Auditorium. Four departments have cooperated on the production which will be performed both Friday and Saturday as the Dance Concert '82.

"The ballet represents a major cooperative effort by many departments at K-State," Luke Kahlich, co-director of the dance department, said.

The dance department is working with the art department on scenery; the clothing, textile and interior design department on design and construction of costumes; and the music department on the use of rehearsal facilities and the orchestra for the production.

"Cordelia," an adaptation of the Shakespearian play "King Lear," involved four years of work and was choreographed by Kahlich.

BECAUSE OF THE length of the play, which tells the story of King Lear through plots and sub-plots, Kahlich said he attempts to tell only the story of Lear's daughter Cordelia.

Cordelia is one of three daughters between whom an aging Lear (Thomas Paden, senior in speech) divides his kingdom. Lear asks his daughters to declare their love for him before giving them a part of the kingdom. Cordelia's sisters, Goneril (Sharon Andres, senior in modern languages) and Regan (Maria Ferguson, senior in dance) profess great love for their father and receive their share. Cordelia, (Lea Shroyer, junior in dance) the only loving and honest daughter, declines to try to outdo them.

In an outrage, Lear banishes her.

The ballet follows Lear's decision to an ultimately tragic end.

KAHLICH RECEIVED an $800 grant from the Faculty Research Award Committee to commission an original musical score for the ballet. Ronald F. Williams, New York, composed the score for a live orchestra and an electronic tape.

Walter Temme, a K-State graduate with a master's degree in music, will conduct the orchestra.

"The interesting thing about this orchestra is that they are not all music majors," Temme said.

Ten students — some of them engineering students according to Temme — and a music teacher from Baker University make up the orchestra. They've been rehearsing with Williams for six to eight hours a week for two and a half weeks, Temme said.

Costumes are being designed to bring out the personality of the characters in the dance. A class taught by Nancy Harper, instructor in clothing, textiles and interior design, is constructing the costumes.

EACH STUDENT HAD a costume to design, according to Harper. Students observed dancers to see how they moved. Then, taking lighting into consideration, they decided what fabric to use and how to construct the costumes.

Royal colors and heavy fabrics were the choices for the costumes of King Lear and the King of France. Goneril and Regan wear costumes designed to be ugly and unbecoming, Harper said. Drab colors were used to show drab personalities, she said.

Composer says live production is new venture

By PAM FITZSIMMONS
Collegian Reporter

One person watching the original production of "Cordelia" this weekend might be humming along with the music as the dancers pirouette across the stage.

Ronald F. Williams, composer of the score, came from New York to view the ballet.

Williams has been acquainted with Luke Kahlich, choreographer and assistant professor of health, physical education and recreation, since college days at Texas Tech at Lubbock.

"I knew Luke at Texas Tech. We have always talked about doing this," Williams said. "But it's sure been hard to do because of long-distance collaboration. It sure can run up a humongous phone bill."

Williams said he received the first part of the scenario from Kahlich in September, and worked on the electronic tape recording from September to January. In January, he began composing and arranging the various parts for the live orchestra.

"Cordelia" is a brand-new experience for him, Williams said. It's the first time he has worked with electronic tape and a live orchestra.

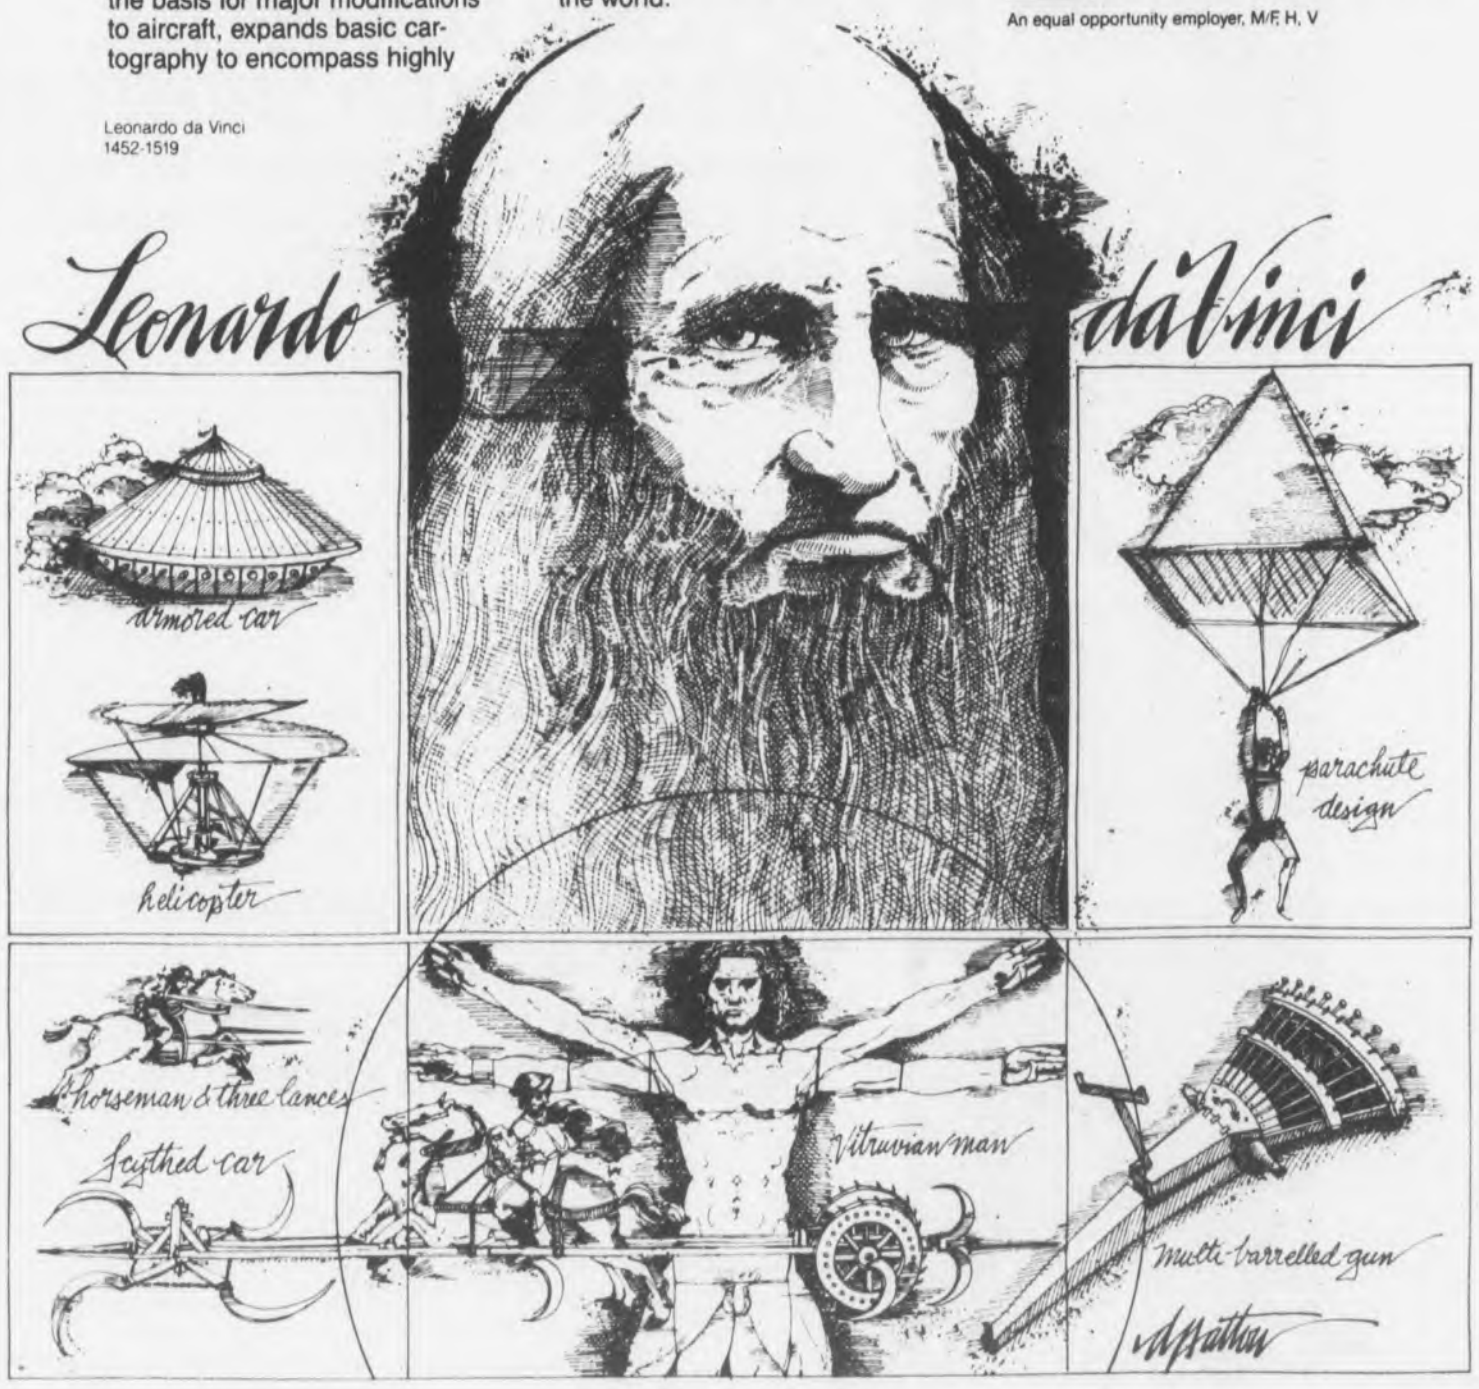
Unquestionably, Leonardo da Vinci possessed one of the world's great minds. Not only renowned as a painter and sculptor, da Vinci also applied his exceptional talents to the mechanics of flight, to cartography for planning military campaigns, and even astronomy.

Today, scientists and engineers at E-Systems continue the tradition by expanding the practical application of advanced technology. E-Systems uses the principles of flight mechanics as the basis for major modifications to aircraft, expands basic cartography to encompass highly sophisticated guidance and command and control systems, and has designed and built a system that greatly expands man's ability to study the universe.



That's only a small segment of the tough problems E-Systems engineers solve in the area of antennas, communications, data acquisition, processing, storage and retrieval systems and other systems applications for intelligence and reconnaissance — systems which are often the first of a kind in the world.

Williams said he didn't just sit down and begin writing with a brilliant flash.

"That is a Hollywood image of composers," he said. "It usually comes during a period of rest for me."

The music he has composed for Cordelia is subjective, Williams said.

"Goneril is made to sound very evil, and Regan, who tries be even more evil, is paced at a faster tempo because she tries to outdo Goneril," he said.

King Lear appears with much fanfare — trumpets, horns and percussion — he said.

"I tried to have a baroque-period sound when doing King Lear," Williams said.

The experience of colloborating on the dance has been a tremendous effort that he said has gone better than expected.

"I am very pleased with the quality of musicians that are here at K-State. I also appreciate the cooperation of the music department," he said.

WILLIAMS GOT his musical start at the age of four. He and his grandfather went to buy a toy piano, but when his grandfather saw the price of the toy, he decided he might as well buy the real thing, Williams said.

"I really started composing when I was 13," Williams said. He wrote his first musical while a senior in high school.

"It was a comedy, styled like the ones Rodgers and Hammerstein wrote. It was called 'The Ivory Panther,' and was somewhat high-schoolish," he said.

After graduating from Texas Tech in 1973 with a music degree, Williams worked as an assistant conductor with the Ice Capades.

But working with the Ice Capades wasn't what he wanted to do, Williams said, so he moved to New York. He has lived there for almost five years, working part-time as a piano accompanist in a voice studio and as a church organist on Sunday.

Dance

"Cordelia, the sweet sister, wears a lighter color and is brighter than the rest," Harper said. Her costume is a light lavendar chiffon which flows and denotes softness and beauty, she said.

"We don't usually focus on costume design in this class, but mostly on fashion design, so this is quite an opportunity for the students," Harper said.

SCENERY CONSISTS of six originally designed fabric banners about 8 feet wide and 18 feet tall. Each was designed and painted to represent the main characters by Jack O'Shea, assistant professor of art.

Banners were chosen for background because time, people and places change so rapidly in the production that something was needed that could be changed quickly and impart an open-air atmosphere to the stage, Kahlich said.

The ballet will present other pieces, including "Baggage" and "Opus Jazz," choreographed by Kahlich and Susan Warden, co-director of dance.

The Dance Concert '82 is the first evening of dance held at K-State this year, Kahlich said.

Angry crowd debates Iranian issue

By PAUL HANSON
Collegian Reporter

A noisy crowd that grew to 150 people at times gathered around a table in the Union lobby Wednesday to discuss politics.

The cause for the crowd was a sign displayed behind the table which proclaimed, "We the students of Kansas State University oppose the distribution of anti-U.S. materials on our campus."

The table was originally set up by John Markiewicz, sophomore in construction science, to help pay for an advertisement he placed in Tuesday's Collegian.

The advertisement attacked pro-Khomeini Iranians at K-State, and Markiewicz said that it was prompted by the actions of Iranian students.

"I got the idea for the ad last week when I walked of out the Union and was met by these students and their anti-U.S. literature," Markiewicz said.

He said he set up the table in the Union after some of his friends and others offered to help pay for the advertisement. He said it was an opportunity for others to express their feelings.

A large jar sat on the table. Throughout the day Markiewicz and his wife, Jill, asked passersby to contribute funds and sign a roster if they agreed with the sentiments expressed in Markiewicz's advertisement.

The collection in the jar totaled more than $150 by day's end, and Markiewicz had collected more than 375 signatures on the pad.

But not all the people gathered around the table supported Markiewicz. There were several discussions going on at all times in areas around the table, often heated exchanges between American and Iranian students.

The mood of the gathering was captured by Pat Eskew, freshman in political science, when he said, "They're just acting on emotions, not really thinking about any issues. There are five or six heated arguments going on right now, based on emotions."

One of the Iranian students, who asked to be known as "Mo," because he feared retribution from "Khomeini's agents," said he thought Markiewicz was taking advantage of bad feelings toward Iranians.

"I want to ask these people why they have signed this paper," Mo said. "If you sign something you should have a reason, and none of these people can give me a reason why they have signed."

"The reason I signed is because I'm tired of hearing a bunch of ---- from these Iranians. I admit I'm somewhat biased," Steve Snook, senior in journalism and mass communications said.

"I signed because I think it's about time we got rid of all these Iranians," said Doug Sherwood, sophomore in business administration. "If they don't like this country there are plenty of planes waiting."

A representative from the Coalition for Human Rights, Marty Kennedy, said he feared Markiewicz's ideas.

"We believe the suppression of any materials, whether or not we agree with their content, is a grave threat to our constitutional rights," Kennedy said.

Officials divert salaries to expenses

By PAUL HANSON
Collegian Reporter

K-State officials have been using funds earmarked for faculty salaries to pay for operating expenses for at least the past five years, President Duane Acker said Thursday.

Acker said it has become standard practice at K-State to leave faculty positions open and use the money budgeted for those positions to pay for equipment, transportation, supplies and travel.

Acker was in Topeka Wednesday and Thursday pleading the University's case for a 13 percent faculty pay raise from the Legislature. Gov. John Carlin has recommended a 10 percent pay raise for state university faculties.

In 1981, approximately $2 million budgeted for faculty salaries was diverted to the other operating expenses (OOE) fund, Acker said.

ON WEDNESDAY, the Eagle-Beacon reported that the funds could have been used to raise faculty salaries, but Acker disputed that report.

Acker said the Legislature budgets funds for the University in two separate areas — salaries and OOE.

"It is legal, proper and normal to take salary monies that we do not expect to use and use these funds toward OOE," Acker said. "It is routine procedure."

Acker said using these funds for additional faculty salary raises would have violated "legislative intent."

"Since we haven't been able to create any new positions, it is possible that a department which loses a $30,000-per-year professor might hire two $15,000-a-year instructors to replace him," Acker said. "Over the years, I would expect that this has led to a greater percentage of instructors and graduate teaching assistants within our faculty ranks."

THE DEPARTMENT heads may also opt to leave a position open and use the budget funds for OOE, according to Acker.

Carlin vetoes proposal to reapportion districts

TOPEKA (AP) — Gov. John Carlin Thursday vetoed the bill sent him last week to reapportion Kansas' five congressional districts, telling the majority Republicans they've got to be less partisan about it and not split Wyandotte and Sedgwick Counties so badly.

In order for him to sign a plan, Carlin told a late-afternoon news conference, the GOP majorities in the two houses must let the minority Democrats have some input — and must avoid whacking up the two big counties the way the first plan did.

The plan the Democratic governor vetoed kept Wyandotte County divided between the 2nd and 3rd Districts, but in a way that eroded Democratic strength in the 2nd District, and split Sedgwick County three ways — among the 1st, 4th and 5th Districts. Riley County is in the 2nd district.

HE SAID that while population deviations among the five districts is important, it is no more important to him than keeping county boundaries intact. Republicans said Carlin's insistence on not dividing counties can only lead to shifting more people from their present districts to new ones.

But if the lawmakers will go back to the drawing board, "make a bipartisn effort, come up with a better plan which includes, say, one split county, I'm not going to get hung up and say I can't accept it," Carlin told reporters.

However, he said he has been assured by the various factions involved in the congressional redistricting fight that it likely will wind up being tested in federal court no matter what plan is passed and signed into law by him.

Republicans expressed disappointment over the veto and some hinted the governor's party might fare even worse under other plans which will now be considered.

Riley County opposes plan for Fort Riley annexation

By JOY CULVER
Collegian Reporter

Riley County commissioners expressed opposition to Junction City's plan to annex Fort Riley during their meeting Thursday afternoon.

The commissioners spoke with John Higgins, Junction City city manager, and Richard Pinaire, Junction City city attorney, about a letter they sent to Junction City opposing the annexation.

Motivation for the annexation came from Junction City commissioners wishing to increase population figures for the city and bring additional revenue sharing funds to Junction City.

According to Darrell Westervelt, chairman of the Riley County Commission, the problem with annexing Fort Riley to Junction City is that about two-thirds of the reservation is in Riley County. The commissioners oppose annexing the portion of Fort Riley that is in Riley County because they believe it could cause financial harm to the county.

"We don't want Riley County's money," Pinaire said.

IN AN ATTEMPT to alleviate Riley County commissioners' concerns about the plan to annex Fort Riley, Sen. Merrill Werts (R-Junction City) is proposing a "balloon bill" that would allow the annexation, but exempt Riley County from receiving financial impact in certain areas.

The Werts bill would amend the original bill which addresses cities annexing military lands. In drafting the bill, Higgins and Pinaire are hoping to persuade the commissioners to ask Sen. Ivan Sand (R-Riley)

Professor challenges evidence in Atlanta trial

ATLANTA (AP) — A defense fiber expert from K-State testified Thursday that fibers used to link Wayne B. Williams to two slain young blacks matched fibers taken at random from a lawyer's office and a fabric store.

The testimony from K-State professor Randall Bresee challenged the heart of the state's case and met with lengthy objections from prosecutors, who questioned his qualifications and the accuracy of his tests.

Defense attorney Alvin Binder angrily charged that prosecutors had "done everything they can to keep the jury from hearing this witness."

Williams, a 23-year-old black free-lance photographer, is charged with murdering Nathaniel Cater, 27, and Jimmy Ray Payne, 21, two of the 28 young blacks slain in a 22-month string of killings here.

NO ARRESTS have been made in the 26 other cases, but prosecutors presented evidence about the slayings of 10 ther young blacks in an effort to show a pattern fitting the Cater and Payne deaths.

Prosecution witnesses testified last month that microscopic fibers found on all 12 victims matched fibers from Williams' home and car.

But Bresee, who said he was testifying in his first criminal case, told the jury that fibers from a carpet in defense lawyer Mary Welcome's office matched fibers from carpet in Williams' home. He said fibers from violet acrylic material bought in a fabric store matched fibers from Williams' bedspread.

THE CARPET and bedspread fibers taken from Williams' home were among the fibers prosecution witnesses had matched to fibers found on Cater's and Payne's bodies.

Prosecution fiber experts testified that scientific tests on 18 different types of fibers and hairs taken from the victims' bodies matched fibers from 18 different sources in Williams' home and car. The state witnesses said that, with that large number of matches, it would be "virtually impossible" for the fibers to have come from anywhere else.

Bresee suggested, however, that the Chattahoochee River, where the bodies of Cater and Payne were found, could have been a source of the fibers found on the victims.

He said he submerged a pillow case in the river last weekend and found "an amazing number of fibers" on the cloth. "The river seems to be full of fibers," he said.

BRESEE SAID there is no way to identify positively the source of any fiber. "It can't be done today. Maybe in the future it can be done," he said.

Prosecutors struck hard at the qualifications of Bresee, who teaches textile science at K-State and holds a doctorate from Florida State University's College of Home Economics.

"I'm not going to ask questions about baking pies," said Assistant District Attorney Gordon Miller.

Bresee, of St. George, admitted he had made fiber comparisons in only one homicide case in the past five years.

Later in the day, Wayne Williams' father Homer Williams testified that carpet squares used to link his son to the slaying were not purchased until after the victim's body was found.

Williams, a 68-year old retired physics teacher and free-lance photographer, testified that the carpet squares were purchased May 25, 1981, the day after Cater's body was found.

Voting rights marchers re-enact protest

MONTGOMERY, Ala. — Nearly 4,000 singing and chanting voting rights marchers jammed the steps of the state capitol Thursday, ending a 13-day re-enactment of a historic 1965 protest with a pledge to find "a new heart in Dixie."

Thousands folded into step with the few dozen who had made the full 150-mile journey as they approached the white-domed capitol, where black leaders vowed to save the Voting Rights Act of 1965, a major victory of the civil rights struggle 17 years ago.

When the parade reached the statehouse steps, march leader Joseph Lowery declared a "massive pilgrimage" would be organized to Washington. He said details would be revealed later.

Lowery was joined by the Rev. Martin Luther King Sr., father of the slain leader of the 1965 march, and the younger King's son, Dexter.

Philharmonic may cancel rest of season

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Despite a furious fund-raising effort that included passing around the hat at recent performances, the Kansas City Philharmonic almost certainly will be forced to cancel the rest of its 49th season, orchestra officials said Thursday.

"I know of no viable financial plan that would keep the Kansas City Philharmonic Association in operation beyond Saturday," said Forrest Browne, chairman of the Philharmonic board of trustees. Browne has headed the drive to raise $800,000 in emergency funds and create a $10 million endowment for the orchestra.

Mark Walker, Philharmonic acting general manager, said the orchestra has given notice to officials at locations where performances were scheduled next week of "the likelihood we will be unable to fulfill our obligations."

Browne and Walker said the orchestra would continue trying to raise money toward its $300,000 in debts, which include about $100,000 in musicians' salaries and fringe benefits due to be paid this week.

Senate approves new prison plans

TOPEKA — The Kansas Senate passed bills Thursday providing for purchase of land and final plans for a new medium security prison at Lansing.

In an emergency funding bill, approved on a vote of 29-11, the Senate provided $1.3 million for plans for the new prison proposed by Gov. John Carlin and $340,000 to purchase land adjacent to Kansas State Penitentiary, where the new facility would be built.

The funding bill, already passed in the House, returns there for consideration of amendments added by the Senate.

Money for the medium security prison, a focal point of a legislative controversy since the 1982 session opened, was added as an amendment to speed up the Legislature's action on the prison.

Convicts enjoy free gambling spree

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. — Seven Florida retirees convicted for playing nickel-and-dime poker, arrived at a Boardwalk casino Thursday for a hero's welcome and a weekend of legal gambling — on the house.

Acknowledging that it was cashing in on the publicity value of the so-called Largo 8, Bally's Park Place offered them three free days of frolic — including news conferences, glittering shows, round-the-clock dinners and cocktails, and even $75 in quarters for the slot machines.

"This is my lucky day. Now where's the craps tables?" said Philbert Lerner, 67, a retired Baltimore electrician, after he plunked two quarters into a slot machine and hit a $50 jackpot.

Two weeks ago, a Florida jury convicted the eight of violating state gambling laws with their afternoon poker games in a Largo mobile home park. Bets were limited to 40 cents, they said, and a good pot was $6 to $8.

Police arrest multiple-slaying suspect

FARWELL, Mich.— The estranged husband of one of seven people killed at a farmhouse was arrested Thursday and a warrant was issued charging him with seven counts of murder, Clare County Sheriff Ghazey Aleck said.

Robert Lee Haggart was arrested in Jasper, Tenn., Aleck said Thursday night, and had a 1980 Buick owned by another member of the slain family when he was taken into custody.

A warrant charging Haggart, a cattle auctioneer from Rosebush, Mich., with seven counts of murder was issued earlier Thursday by the Clare County prosecutor's office, Aleck said.

Earlier in the day, Aleck had said at a news conference, "Further investigation has put us in a better position to say Robert Haggart is a suspect" in the killings of George Post, his wife, two daughters and three grandchildren Tuesday night.

Haggart, 31, was the husband of Garnetta Haggart, 23, one of Post's daughters killed in the massacre at the Post home near this central Michigan town of 1,000.

New senators, new issues

Last night a new group of student senators was sworn into office. Also last night another group of student senators stepped down.

The new student senators have a rough road ahead of them. Although there was not one overriding issue for this election these senators will be faced with the burden of representing all the students from their respective colleges.

The senators that stepped down last night did have an overriding issue facing them during their term. That was the coliseum issue. But that was not the only issue addressed by those senators.

The outgoing senators provided funding for the parachute club, setting a precedent for financing sports clubs which the new senate must deal with. They set up the basis for running basketball ticket sales. They have set up a means for determining an alternative to ASK as a student lobbying organization.

Theirs was not an easy term as senators. But they resolved the conflicts that faced them. The new Student Senate must now resolve the conflicts that face them. Good luck.

Support the 'Cats in KU contest

The basketball game Saturday in Lawrence affords a rare opportunity for those fortunate enough to have tickets.

The Wildcats have not fared well on the road this season and this is a perfect opportunity for 'Cat fans to show their support on the road.

This is an important time of the season for college basketball teams, as they gear up for the NCAA playoffs. A road victory for the slumping Wildcats could start them toward successful Big Eight and NCAA tournament appearances.

Support the 'Cats and wear purple.

Black History Month

Editor,

February is Black History Month. Long before black Americans made headlines on the playing fields, they were making history. Plenty of it. In fields like medicine, exploration, science, industry and the fields of battle. The names of these "superstars" are probably unknown to you. That's because they aren't in most history books. Superstars like Dr. Daniel Hale Williams, a surgeon who performed the world's first successful heart operation almost 100 years ago; Mathew Henson, first man to reach the North Pole; Dr. Charles Drew who through research gave us blood plasma. El-Hajj Malik El Shabazz (Malcom X), world renowed statesman, engineer Lewis H. Latimer who paved the way for the invention of the lightbulb.

And this is just the tip of a huge mountain of history that hasn't been recognized. This is one of the many reasons February is Black History Month. It is an outgrowth of Black History Week which occured the second week of February each year. Initially this week has chosen to coincide with Abraham Lincoln's birthday. Expanding the celebration to a month means that the knowledge obtained during this period will not be forgotten. This history should not be neglected and miscontrued the way TV and other forms of the media have done to countless events that helped build this nation. Black History Month means a greater concentration on displaying and studying the contributions of my people to the world. This has been the pattern over the few years and indeed there is a great need for blacks and whites . . . especially in predominantly white institutions of learning to become cognizant of the many contributions of blacks in myriad fields of endeavor.

Purple revenge

Tomorrow, I'm getting even. I'm dressing in purple, forgetting homework for a day and going to Lawrence for the one and probably only KU-K-State basketball game I will ever attend there.

My main reason for going isn't to watch the Wildcats demolish the Chickenhawks. Like I said before, I'm getting even — with my sister. She has one unforgivable fault which I'd like to reckon with once more (in person) before I graduate and never have the chance to again. My deep, dark secret is now to be exposed for all to see.

My sister, Mary, is a sophomore at K-Who (excuse me, KU).

That fact festers in the darkened corners of my consciousness and never fails to make me uncomfortable. The disappointments (for me) began when she was a high school senior. In fact, it was the moment she returned to me the most special and unique gift she could have hoped to receive, a K-State T-shirt. She nonchalantly (dare I say in a Snob Hill manner?), told me I'd have better use for it than she would. The horrible truth was unveiled immediately, she actually had the gall to announce she had decided upon K-Who as her university choice.

I TRIED to talk her out of it, but she prevailed. Mom and Dad didn't help either. They thought it humorous that I was so adamant about saying how wrong she was. I even brought up the hassles of driving the six hours between Gayhawk country and our home town, but even that didn't work.

I convinced myself that it wouldn't be that bad. It was only right for the oldest sister in the family to go to the best university in Kansas and the second oldest to go to the second best. It made me feel better, temporarily, but troubles soon began.

We were driving Mary's car home one weekend and some K-State students passed us and put up a sign in their window that said, "KU SUCKS." There I was, driving down I-70 in a car displaying a red and blue Gayhawk parking sticker and wearing the T-shirt she had returned to me. I was so disgusted at being associated with K-Who (and my sister's incessant laughter), that I floored the accelerator, pulled up to the car that had passed us, rolled down my window and explained my unenviable position. They said they understood. My sister laughed even louder.

THEY WEREN'T the only K-Stater's that hassled me. Many of the people I know have said, "YOU have a sister that goes to KU?" There is nothing for me to do to reconcile my hostile feelings toward my sister but to get even, which is exactly what I've been trying to do.

Maybe I went too far and am partly to blame when I sent her five K-State postcards in a row, but she didn't have to retaliate! Mary's attack was worse than mine. She countered my postcard attack with an ad from K-Who's student newspaper. The ad was for K-State bumper stickers and it read: K.S.U. — where men are men and sheep are nervous. Tacky beyond compare, but what do you expect from a K-Who fan?

I'LL BIDE MY TIME, until tomorrow. I can't wait to see my sister's face when I greet her wearing the brightest purple T-shirt I own. I'm going to let her entire residence hall know she has a sister from Silo Tech (which is as of yet unadvertised) and then sit back and laugh.

One thing troubles me. At times, I find myself struggling in the middle of a sentence, trying desperately (it's hard, believe me), to pick out some K-Who advantage, however minute, for the sake of defending a sister who strayed from the desired path I had envisioned for her. Is it possible that blood is thicker than Purple Pride?

I often daydream about how great it would be if I had a normal sister, one that attended any university besides K-Who. I have but one consolation. I have one other sister at home and she's an eighth grader. Maybe...just maybe...

Restriction of rights sets dangerous precedent

Editor,

A massive argument raged in the KSU Union on February 17. At issue was whether or not foreign students, especially Iranians, should have the right to criticize the government of the United States. The argument was that good, patriotic U.S. citizens should not have to stand by and have a bunch of foreigners condemn the very nation which is letting them live in peace and go to school within its borders. That is a very good point. However, it is a very dangerous thing to begin restricting rights in the name of patriotism. And it is a very dangerous thing to say, "My country, right or wrong." Witness Nazi Germany.

Americans need to step back for a moment and ask themselves why these people are condemning the U.S. It is not just Iranians. All over the world people are resentful of U.S. domination in the same way we were once resentful of Great Britain. We gave the Shah of Iran a police force called SAVAK and a military arsenal of awesome power. He used those things to oppress and suppress his subjects. His reign of torture and execution led to the popular revolution which ousted him in 1979. It should be no surprise that the Iranians now hate his former ally and supporter.

America must stop supporting the right wing dictators of the world just because they are anti-communist. Communism can't be stamped out by violence. But it can spread that way. See Vietnam, Angola or Cuba.

Don't tell me to go to Russia and see how much freedom I'd have there. I know how bad Russia is. Instead of pointing our finger at Russia and attempting to justify ourselves by their corruption, why don't we point our finger the other way and clean up our own act so that we don't have to worry about foreign students' complaints?

Free speech is major issue...

Editor,

It has been said the United States is a country of free speech. We are seeing this principle in use here on our campus. Our system of freedom of speech was used first by Iranians who supported Imam Khomeini then by Iranians against Imam Khomeini and now by John Markienwicz.

I agree with Marty Kennedy, a representative from the coalition of Human Rights, as he was quoted on page 16 of the February 18 Collegian saying "We believe the supression of any material whether or not we agree with their contents, is a grave threat to our constitutional rights." I agree with him not only for the Iranians but for John Markienwicz's right to speech.

To the two Iranian groups, John Markienwicz and anyone else who will speak out on any issue, I may not agree with what you will say but, I will defend your right to say it.

...in continuing controversy

Editor,

I am one of many that signed the petition by John Markiewicz opposing the distribution of anti-American material by Iranians.

First of all I want to make it clear that I do not oppose anyone in America, visitor or not, expressing his or her opinion. What I am opposed to is constant whining with inaction. I feel no one in the United States or anywhere else has the right to squeal when he or she is being stepped on and yet not struggle to avoid the foot. John apparently felt he was being stepped on in Iran and not only did he squeal, he did something about it; he moved back to the United States.

Finally I want to address something directly to the Iranian people in America. Tell me how you would feel if you invited a family to come stay at your house then the first day there they walk through the house and tell you your house looks like crap and you're an idiot running a household like this. Then they sit down and make themselves at home for the rest of the week.

Students protest 'anti-U.S. materials'

By ANN SANDERSON
Collegian Reporter

The heated discussions continue and the number of tables set up in the Union grows as students mingle and discuss politics once again — a scene slightly reminiscent of the turbulent late 1960s.

"I have nothing against constructive criticism against the U.S. government, but referring to them as 'West imperialist fascist pigs,' the total bad guy in other words, is not constructive criticism," John Markiewicz, sophomore in construction science, said.

Markiewicz is one of the students manning a table set up in the Union to get signatures on a petition that states, "We students of Kansas State University oppose the distribution of anti-U.S. materials on our campus."

ACCORDING TO Markiewicz, the table was not set up to pay him back for an ad run in Tuesday's Collegian. The table was set up to show "the continued support of the students."

The donations in the jar on the table will go toward payment for publishing the comments (both pro and con) being given about Markiewicz's ad and toward publishing the signatures on the petition.

Many people supported his ad, Markiewicz said, but would not sign the petition because of the word "oppose" on the billboard at the table.

"The billboard was grossly misinterpreted. The word 'oppose' in Webster's (dictionary) means 'to hold a contrary opinion; to speak against'," Markiewicz said.

Dave Bowen, sophomore in pre-law, is one of the students working at the table with Markiewicz.

"I'm not trying to take away anyone's rights. Just as they have freedom of speech, so do I, and I'll use mine to state I'm against what they are handing out," Bowen said.

ANOTHER TABLE, set up near Markiewicz's table, asks for signatures of those who agree with the statement, "Freedom of speech for all."

Megan Patterson, senior in management, said the table was set up because "anti- or otherwise, everyone has a right to be heard."

Doug Rice, sophomore in mechanical engineering, said he signed both petitions because he is for Markiewicz's ad, but doesn't agree with the sign at Markiewicz's table which states an opposition to the distribution of anti-U.S. materials.

"I do agree with free speech," he said.

"What I oppose here is the student who says he opposes anti-U.S. literature distributed on campus," Mike Allen, freshman in computer science, said.

One signature on the petition at Markiewicz's table was Casey Case's, a sophomore in general business.

"I don't think it's right for guests in this country to come in and bad mouth it," Case said.

Markiewicz said he realized that he may have "lost support" because of the use of the word 'oppose' in the sign at his table, but he believes there has been an increase in student involvement "discussing international issues."

All the excitement in the Union the past few days has not seemed to bother Walt Smith, Union director, who said the controversy has been good for the students.

"A little debate never hurt anyone, as long as they don't get unhappy or unruly," Smith said. "Then we'd have to put a stop to it."

Acker

"The responsible parties, the deans and department heads, normally make the decision to leave a position open at the beginning of a fiscal year," Acker said. "But it is possible that a department could have to let a faculty member go in the middle of a term because they needed the salary funds to pay for operating expenses."

It has become necessary to use salary money to pay operating expenses because the Legislature has been raising the faculty salary budget twice as fast as the OOE budget over the past several years, Acker said, adding that funding has been directed toward people rather than equipment.

THERE WAS NO no input from Faculty Senate concerning the transfer of salary funds to meet operating expenses, according to Heinz Bulmahn, Faculty Senate president and associate professor of modern languages.

"I am remotely familiar with the fact that this is a tool of management," Bulmahn said, "but I don't know any of the specifics of this particular situation. We would be concerned if it lowered the amount of funding available for the faculty salaries."

Of the $2 million diverted toward operating expenses, Acker said that half was transferred within the Division of Extension. Another $600,000 was within the agricultural and engineering experimental programs. Acker said most of the remaining funds were diverted from salaries within the physical plant. The transfers had little effect on the classroom positions, he said.

"In extension, unlike education, you can close out a program, let a position open, and you won't have a bunch of students showing up to an empty classroom.

"But if we have someone in the extension program working on roses and he decides to leave, we can leave his position open and discontinue the rose program," Acker said. "We then can use the money budgeted for his salary to buy new and better equipment to study wheat with."

FUNDS FROM approximately 20 open positions are now being used to pay expenses within the Division of Extension, according to E.J. Peterson, assistant to the director for business and finance.

"The director has always said that we've got to support our faculty (with needed supplies and operating expenses)," Peterson said. "If this requires keeping positions open to provide operating funds, then that is what we do.

"We have never dismissed anyone from a position simply because we needed their salary to pay operating expenses. However, when someone leaves, we review their position to see whether or not we should attempt to fill it," he said.

The transfers from salaries to OOE were much larger at K-State than at the other state universities. Acker said this was because of K-State's extensive extension network.

"The funds which the extension takes from salaries for OOE, they really need it," Acker said. "Otherwise, the people who should be going out across the state to meetings will be sitting behind their desks in Manhattan, or they'll be writing bulletins which we don't have the funds to print up and send out. Or perhaps we'll have a soil scientist who wants to analyze 150 soil samples and we won't have the equipment to do his job properly."

Acker said he did not believe revealing the fund transfers would harm the University's quest for additional funding.

"I think we have good understanding from the key legislators, and I think they understand that the OOE money has been needed," Acker said.

Reagan refuses to disclose future of U.S. military aid for El Salvador

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Reagan said Thursday that his administration has "no plans to send American combat troops into action" in El Salvador or anywhere else. He wouldn't discuss U.S. options for increased military support of the Salvadoran government.

The Central American nation of El Salvador is under attack by leftist guerrillas and is being aided by American military aid and advisers. Asked what further steps he might take, Reagan told a news conference: "I just don't believe that you discuss those options of what you may or may not do."

To tip his hand, Reagan said, would reduce American leverage.

Asked whether there are any circumstances under which he might use U.S. troops, Reagan said:

"Well, maybe if they dropped a bomb on the White House I might get mad."

In discussing his controversial budget proposal, Reagan left open the possibility of compromise, saying that if opponents "come up with some specific suggestions, suggest something, we'll take a look at it."

But he then added that "we cannot back away on national defense" without sending the wrong message to both allies and potential adversaries and he called his tax cut policy "the strongest thing we have" toward restoring productivity.

The president opened his eighth news conference by announcing that he will name a panel of private citizens to search out waste and inefficiency in the government with an eye to controlling costs.

"This will be the largest effort of its kind ever mounted to save tax dollars," Reagan said. He said the members of the volunteer panel will be named within a few days.

"I expect them to roll up their sleeves and search out waste and inefficiency" he said. "We mean business and we intend to get results."

As he has before, Reagan said his economic policies will produce recovery from the current recession, but he added, "I'm just not going to be pinned down on a date" as to when recovery will come.

Reagan also said that high interest rates represent "the greatest single threat today to a healthy, lasting recovery" from the recession. Major banks increased the prime rate Wednesday from 16½ to 17 percent.

The president said that reflected concern that the Federal Reserve Board might ease monetary policy, and that the administration might tolerate ever-higher deficits. Reagan's own budget projects record deficits, with the figure this year estimated at $98.6 billion.

But he said the Federal Reserve and the administration can and will work together to produce monetary and fiscal policies that should quell concerns in the money markets. "I will devote the resources of my presidency to keeping deficits down over the next several years," he said.

But Reagan also said he would not compromise on his call for an 18 percent increase in defense spending next year, a budget that has become a prime target for congressional critics — both Republican and Democratic — bent on curbing the deficit.

"We cannot back away on national defense without sending a message to our allies and adversaries that would be very unwise," Reagan said.

Reagan also:

—Expressed concern about the plight of the American farmer. "I don't know what sector of the economy is hurt worse than the American farmer," he said. He said he would use a grain embargo as a foreign policy tool "only as part of an across the board embargo" because he "won't penalize one sector of our industry — the farmers."

—Said "we're not just an arms supplier" despite the controversy surrounding Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger's discussions with Jordan about the possible purchase of additional American weapons, including missiles and F-16 fighters. He said Weinberger "was representing the United States" but "I don't believe (his mission) was correctly portrayed in some of the stories" about the talks.

City experiences black out after Salvador rebel assault

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador (AP) — Leftist guerrillas destroyed several transmission towers Thursday morning near Santa Ana, 30 miles northwest of San Salvador, leaving parts of the nation's second-largest city without electricity.

They also claimed their forces killed or wounded 372 government soldiers in clashes last month and reiterated that the "the hour of national insurrection approaches."

Meanwhile, Lt. Gen. Wallace Nutting, head of the Panama-based Southern Command and the senior U.S. army commander in Latin America, planned to speak with reporters for the first time since arriving here to assess the military situation.

The press session was scheduled at Ilopango Airport, near the capital, where guerrillas destroyed more than half the Salvadoran air force in a daring raid Jan. 27.

In Washington, President Reagan told a news conference earlier in the day that he has "no plans to send American combat troops into action" in El Salvador or anywhere else. But he said it would not serve any purpose to discuss other options under consideration to assist the junta.

The guerrillas' Radio Venceremos claimed the raid destroyed 20 planes and six helicopters, or 70 percent of the Salvadoran air force. The Pentagon has said the count was six helicopters — already replaced — and eight airplanes.

Radio Venceremos claimed Thursday that last month's casualties took place in 142 clashes in 19 locations around the country. The broadcast did not break down its figure into killed and wounded.

The casualty count appeared to be much higher than the military has claimed in its daily announcements, but official spokesmen in the military press office were not available immediately for comment.

Claims on casualty figures from the opposing sides in this Central American nation regularly differ widely and cannot be confirmed independently.

"The hour of national insurrection is near," Radio Venceremos said, echoing other comments made since Jan. 1. It urged people to be "ready with food supplies and medicines."

Leftist guerrillas are fighting to oust the U.S.-supported civilian-military junta that took power in an October 1979 coup. Church and human rights groups estimate 32,000 people have been killed in the 27 months of political violence since then.

Painting spree damages cars in campus lot

Vandalism to nine student vehicles was discovered early Thursday morning in a Goodnow Hall parking lot, according to Lt. Charles Beckom of Security and Traffic.

The vehicles were sprayed with flat black paint, and the damage was discovered by Security and Traffic at 1:30 a.m. Thursday, Beckom said.

The majority of the vehicles were sprayed on the back or side with a sweeping motion, apparently by someone on foot. All the damaged vehicles were in the lot south of Goodnow Hall, just off Denison Avenue, Beckom said.

A non-enamel art or craft paint was used and a majority of the students have been able to remove the paint without damaging their vehicles, according to Beckom.

Some evidence has been accumulated, but there were no known witnesses to the crime. So far, there is no total of the amount of damage resulting from the vandalism.

The incident has been classified as criminal damage to property, Beckom said, and is currently being investigated by Security and Traffic.

New test offers second chance to earn credit

By CATHY DAVIDSON
Collegian Reporter

Now you see it, now you don't.

Actually, it's just the opposite in the speech and psychology departments. Some students in those departments are taking a different type of exam, the latent image test. Such tests use a special ink that reveals the answer when a developer ink is applied to the answer blanks on the paper.

"It's like taking lemon juice in a pen and writing on paper. It's invisible and you can't see it until you hold it over a candle so it heats and and the writing appears. It's a secret type of writing," Thomas Longhurst, associate professor of speech pathology, said.

The tests are designed to give students a second chance to mark the correct answer.

"With this process (latent image), students can get partial credit if they keep trying until they get the right answer," said Jerome Frieman, associate professor of psychology.

STUDENTS RESPOND to the latent image test in two ways, according to Frieman. One effect is students have a "little test anxiety" because they are less reluctant to make "that initial choice." The other effect is negative — occuring when a student is confident his answer is correct but immediately finds he was incorrect, causing him to become more careless in choosing other answers, Frieman said.

"I can see where somebody that doesn't do well on these kind of tests can panic," Julie Lawrence, junior in family and child development, said. "If the first page is full of yellow marks they already know they've lost all the credit for that page. I can see where it could really affect the rest of the test."

However, students do benefit some from learning their about their mistakes immediately, Frieman said.

"Students score their own tests, we go over them in class immediately afterward. They already know what their problems were. Students know immediately after they mark their answers if they were correct or not," Longhurst said.

OVER THE YEARS, Longhurst said he has noted that students have always indicated a desire to have more tests during a semester in contrast to having just a few exams. It seems that testing on material covered in a two to three week period is more favorable than testing only at midterm and the final week, he said.

"Giving more standard format tests in a semester would take too much time since it usually takes a class period to take the test and one to go over it. We need class time to present and discuss course material," Longhurst said.

To help meet students' requests and economize on time used for testing, Longhurst said he looked for a self-scoring method. The latent image approach appeared to be the answer.

On a typical multiple choice test, once a student has made his first choice he does not get any credit for partial information he may know about the question. With the latent image developer system, the student can "essentially make as many choices as he wants," Longhurst said.

The student gets five points for his first choice, three points for his second choice and one point for his third.

WHEN THE TESTS are prepared, "NA" is typed in the answer blanks for no answer, "TA" for try again, or "Yes" for the correct answer. When the final test copies are completed the latent image in the brackets does not appear, so when students take the test they choose what answer they want, marking it with a pen filled with the special developer ink, Longhurst said.

Longhurst has been using the tests for approximately five years. He uses them in his Introduction to Speech Pathology, Language Development and Language Assessments and Intervention classes.

The advantages of the latent image tests outweigh the disadvantages, he said. Disadvantages include a longer preparation time because of the way the tests must be typed, and the grades have to be recorded by hand because no print-out of the test results is made.

"There's no uncertainty. You sit there and think it's either going to tell me I'm right or wrong. You don't have this period in between where you wait and think you did really bad. You can get high anxiety during a test," according to Kathy Clarke, junior in family and child development.

"They're less confusing than a computer card and you find out the answers and the score right away," she said.

Regents, presidents request cut in residency standards

TOPEKA (AP) — The Kansas Board of Regents and university presidents appealed to a Senate committee Thursday to reduce the residency requirements for out-of-state students from a year to six months.

Clark Ahlberg, president of Wichita State University, said the regents and the leaders of all six state universities supported the proposal to cut the residency standard in half.

Tuition fees for out-of-state residents are double to triple those for state residents.

The bill, Ahlberg told the Senate Ways and Means Committee, is aimed at so-called nontraditional students, those who hold fulltime jobs and also attend school.

"It certainly would simplify the lives of those persons to reduce the residency requirements to six months," Ahlberg said, noting that all Kansas community colleges and Washburn University of Topeka have that standard.

The committee did not act on the measure.

Presently, an out-of-state student who is not financially dependent upon his parents can qualify for resident status and lower tuition at the six state universities only after living in Kansas for 12 months.

Ahlberg and James Appleberry, president of Pittsburg State University, said their concern was for part-time students who come to a city because of a job and then decide to further their education.

K-State President Duane Acker did not testify at the hearing.

"I believe it is a constructive proposal. It (the bill) can be a step in the right direction for those families who have moved into Kansas to work," Acker told the Collegian.

"I believe it is a constructive proposal. It can be a ste Ahlberg noted that about 50 percent of his school's enrollment of nearly 17,000 are students who attend classes while holding fulltime jobs.

Jim Gregory of Beech Aircraft Corp., Wichita, testified that the lower residency requirement would help industry attract workers.

"The engineering talent which we actively recruit from other states holds continuing education in high esteem," he said. "It (the bill) would contribute to effective recruiting programs."

William Kauffman, staff attorney for the Board of Regents, assured the committee that the bill would not permit nonresident students to suddenly qualify for lower tuition rates.

Besides a student's source of income, Kauffman said, residency is also determined after consideration of whether a person intends to permanently reside in Kansas.

The regents' spokesman said it was not yet certain how much money would be lost through students paying lower tuition. Last year, when a similar bill was killed by the Ways and Means Committee, the regents estimated a $300,000 loss of revenue.

Financial aid programs may drop to new lows

By TIM MORSE
Collegian Reporter

Students who think it is hard to get financial assistance now should get ready for more heartaches.

President Reagan's proposed cuts for various student financial assistance programs mean a significant decrease in the near future, according to Bob Evans, director of Student Financial Assistance, who relayed Reagan's plans regarding a budget message on Feb. 8.

The basic student grant program, originally appropriated at $2.28 billion, would be cut to $1.4 billion under Reagan's current proposal, if Congress approves that reduction, Evans said.

William Blakey, a council member to the Subcommittee of Post Secondary Education, expressed his concern with Reagan's proposals to cut financial aid to students.

"The members of the subcommittee are generally opposed (to the proposals)," Blakey said. "There is a strong negative feeling of the reductions proposed."

THE FINANCIAL assistance office does not yet know the effect of the proposals, but Evans said he estimates 20 percent of the grants currently available will be reduced significantly.

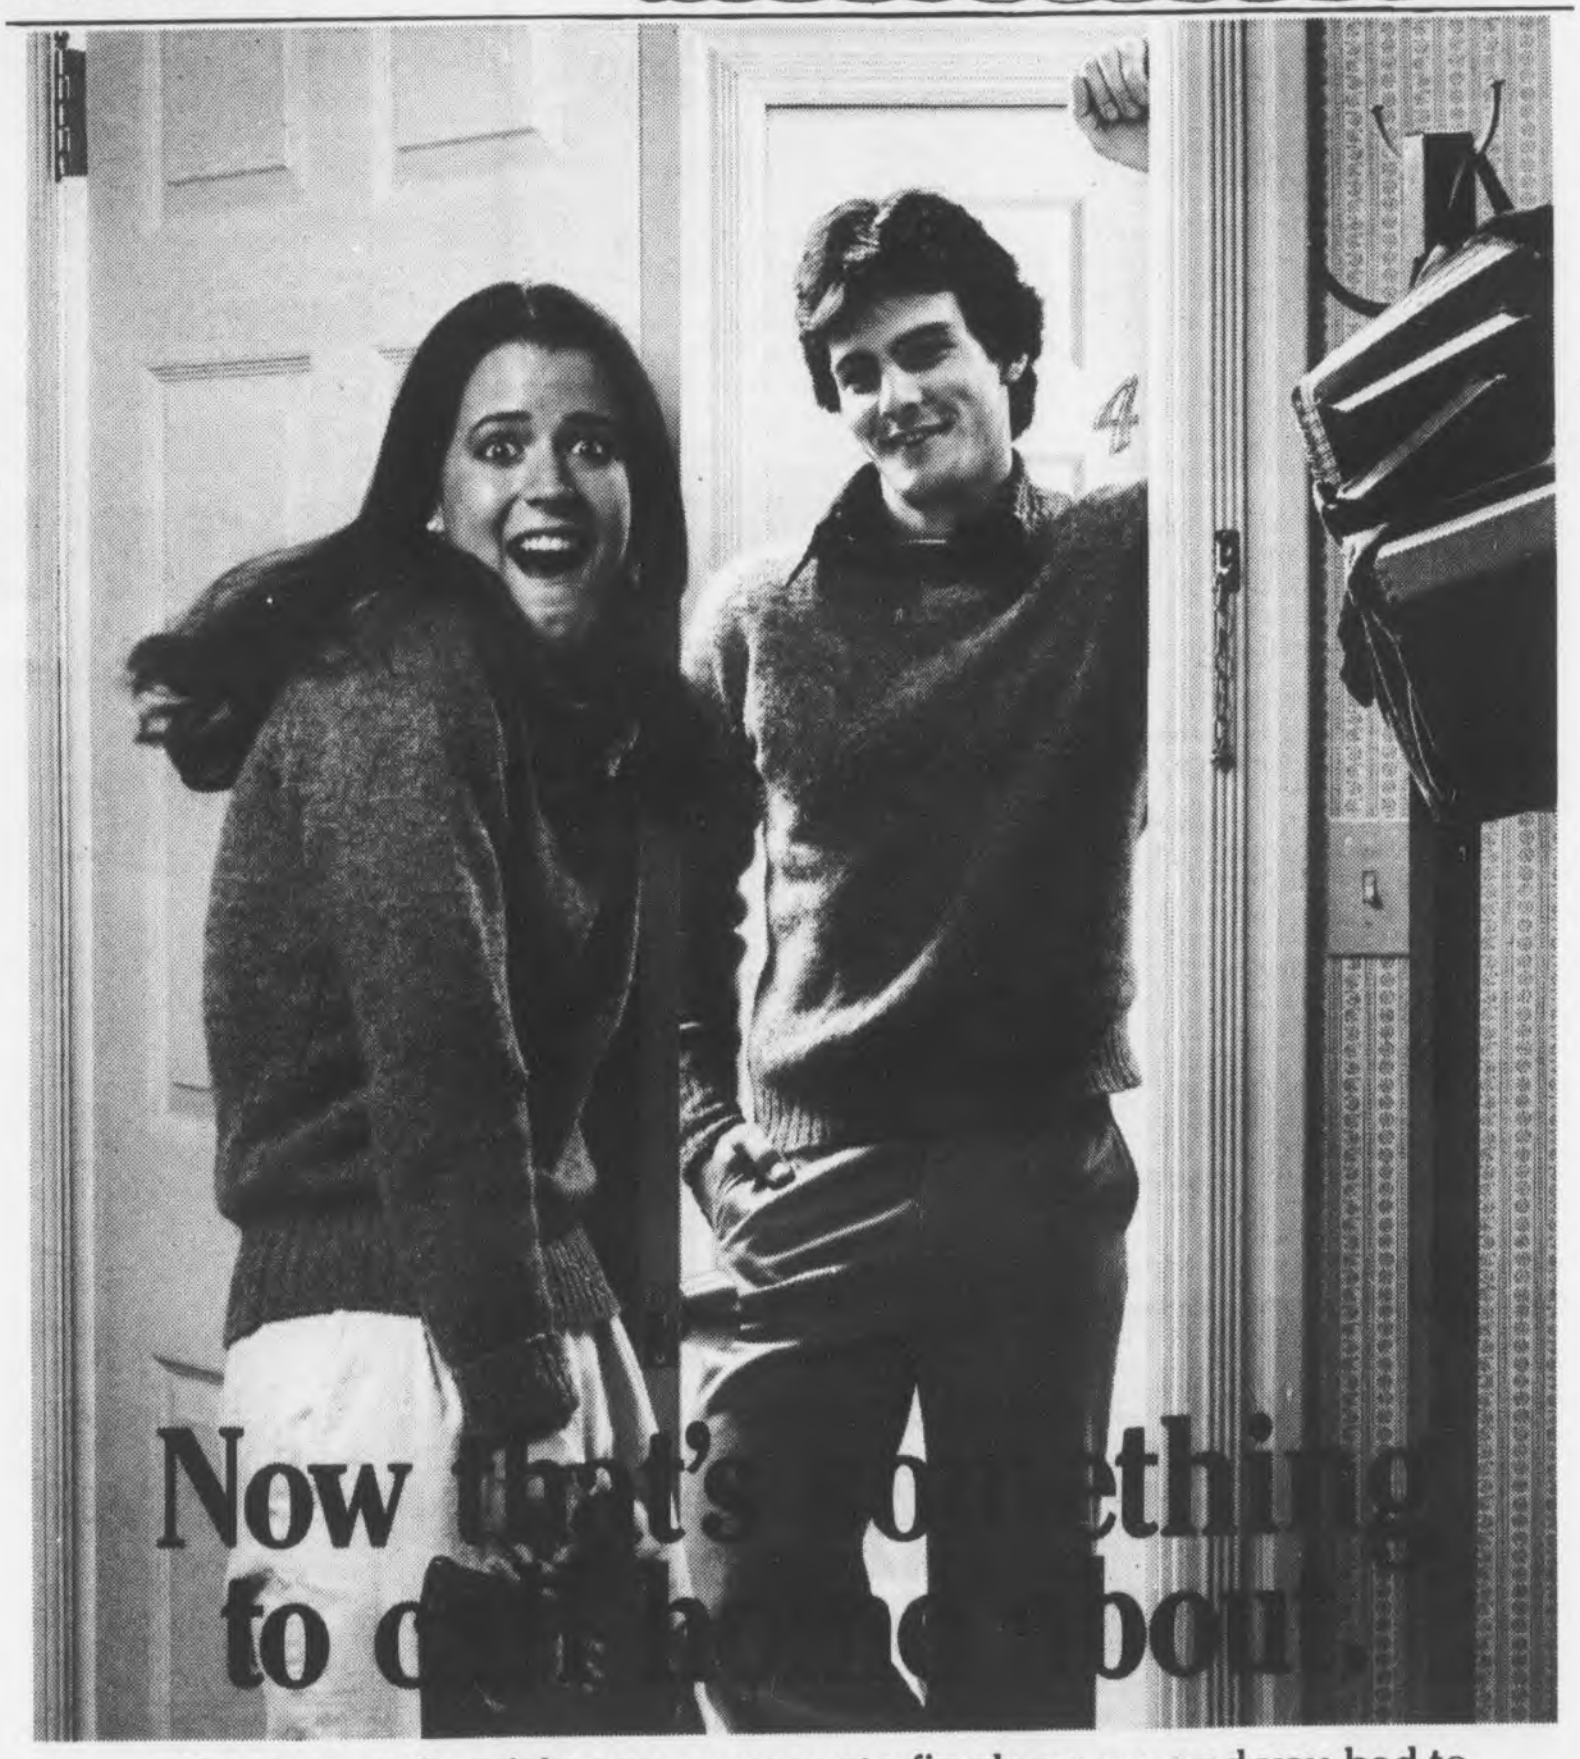
According to Reagan's suggestion, no money would be allocated to the supplemental grant program. Currently 550 K-State students are receiving $275,000 from that program, Evans said.

Last year, the National Direct Student Loan (NDSL) program received $180,000 of new federal money. The new proposals call for no more new federal funding. Evans estimates about 225 students will not get NDSL loans as a result of that proposal.

The College Work Study program was originally planned with an appropriation of $528 million, but has been decreased to $400 million. That reduction may reduce the available jobs at K-State by 20 percent, Evans said.

The State Student Incentive Grant program has been recommended "zero funding," Evans said. About 525 Kansas State scholars would be effected.

ALL GRADUATE students have been eliminated from the Guaranteed Student Loan (GSL) program. That eliminates $2.3 million and about 575 students from the program.



Reagan has suggested an alternative — the Parent Loan Program. Under that program, graduate students would borrow money at 14 percent interest rather than 9 percent, as was the rate for the GSL. The remaining eligible GSL recipients would be required to pay interest on their loans while in school, Evans said.

"We (student financial aid) are concerned that we are well into February and that we do not yet know how much (funding) we will have available next year. We can't process GSL applications yet. We do not have student loan applications and will not have them until Congress decides how in the world we're going to process them," Evans said. "Every program that we administer here in this office is affected by that budget message as a reduction."

Sci-fi creatures invade Imagin Con weekend

Imagine a robot rescuing a damsel from a science fiction monster while a belly dancer plays a computer game. This mixed-up conglomeration will all be going on at the Imagin Con at 6 p.m. today, Saturday and Sunday in the Union Ballroom.

The Imagin Con, a science fiction convention, will be sponsored by the K-State Gaming Council, Shire of the Spinning Winds and Foresight Unlimited, explained Jim Parrish, senior in engineering technology and Gaming Council president.

"The Shire of the Spinning Winds is an organization in Kansas that sponsors the Renaissance Festival in Kansas City every year," Parrish said. "They are members of a national organization called the Society for Creative Anachronisms (SCA), and they will be giving medieval demonstrations on Saturday and Sunday."

Foresight Unlimited is an organization whose goal is the creation of science fiction and fantasy conventions open for the enjoyment of all.

Parrish said that Lee Killough, of Manhattan, author of "The Monitor, the Miners and the Shree" and "Deadly Silents," will be at the convention. Killough will be autographing her books Friday and will be reading "Pitcarn's Planet" during Saturday's festivities.

Students in industrial microprocessing class will be demonstrating the robots they built last semester, Parrish said.

"The robots will be on display in the middle of the Union Ballroom," he said.

The activity of interest to most students is the costume contest at 6:30 p.m. Sunday in the Union Big Eight Room, Parrish said. This event is open for the public to enter and is also free to spectators.

Students may enter one of four categories: Science Fiction, Fantasy, Dungeons & Dragons or SCA.

All persons entering must be preregistered by 10 p.m. Saturday.

Other activities taking place at noon on Saturday and Sunday are a fencing tournament, belly dancing, science fiction movies, computer games and a Dungeons & Dragons Tournament, Parrish said.

"This is just a trial convention to see how many people are interested in all of these activities," he said, "but if we have a good turn-out, this could be the start of something new at K-State."

Committee to govern lines for basketball ticket sales

Student Senate passed a bill last night providing for a new basketball ticket sales policy that will govern the sales distribution of reserved and non-reserved basketball tickets.

The policy will set up a committee to organize the ticket lines and establish guidelines with the cooperation of the K-State ticket sales manager, John Gilliam, junior in agriculture education, said.

The Basketball Ticket Sales Committee will be responsible for the official sign-up book for the lines, distribution of the official numbers and identification of the check-in point. It will also be responsible for roll calls, Gilliam said.

The group running the line will be in charge of the line as long as the people in line stay within the guidelines set up by the state, campus and committee.

Ken Christie, graduate in agricultural economics, introduced the proposed plans for reorganizing Farrell Library.

In the reorganization, all periodicals will be moved to the second floor. First floor will be used for reference materials. The lobby area in the old part of the second floor will be turned into a browsing area. The existing browsing area on the first floor will be turned into an office area, Christie said.

Angela Scanlan, senior in agricultural journalism, outlined the Student Advisory Council's end-of-year report. The report was given to the legislative leadership, Gov. John Carlin and the Board of Regents.

The major issues addressed by the report were a 13 percent faculty salary increase and an increase in other operating expenses funding.

The 1982-83 student senators were sworn in and conducted their first official meeting immediately following the adjournment of the regular senate meeting.

Geri Greene, junior in journalism and mass communications, was nominated for Student Senate chairman. Further nominations will be accepted until the next meeting. Final vote will be at the next meeting.

JV 'dark horses' await their chance

Staff/Rob Clark

Eyes on the ball... K-State's Mark Bohm, a freshman walk-on, keeps careful watch on Vincent Doty of Dodge City Community College during the JV game Wednesday night. The 'Cats won 72-68.

By TRACEY ALLEN
Collegian Reporter

While waiting for their chance to play varsity ball some day, the junior varsity squad steadily goes through another practice session.

Known to some students as the "dark horses" of basketball, the squad listens attentively as Coach Hank Harris gives instructions for the next drill.

Potential junior varsity (JV) basketball team members are selected through an all-University tryout in October. Of the 50 to 75 students who try out, the majority of those selected are walk-ons, with the exception of a few varsity members who sometimes participate for the experience.

ACCORDING TO Coach Jack Hartman, the JV program provides support for the varsity program. "For one thing, it gives us some players to practice against," Hartman said. "Also, it gives younger players the opportunity to develop certain skills which may later help them in winning a position on our varsity team. Many of these kids are in the background and therefore no one is aware of the hard work that they go through."

Harris agrees. "It gives the kids the chance to mature a little bit," he said.

Harris, a Tennessee State graduate, believes there are some advantages to playing JV ball. "One thing about JV basketball is that you get more time to play, whereas you might not in playing varsity," he said. "Not only that, but it also lets people know that you're playing basketball for K-State, whether it's JV or varsity."

FOR MANY OF the players on the squad, the program has some advantages and some disadvantages.

"I feel that it helps those who are freshman," Kenny Williams said. Williams, a 6-foot-4 freshman guard from Chicago, Ill., believes that playing JV ball can help a player out in the long run.

"At first, when I started playing JV I thought that I wasn't good enough to play varsity," he said. "I thought that I was either too slow or I wasn't a good shooter. However, I later found out that that wasn't true.

"In a lot of ways, playing JV has prepared me," he said. "It helps take the pressure off you when going into a varsity game."

Greg Livingston, a 6-foot-3 point guard from Coffeyville, believes there are some differences between JV ball and varsity ball.

"In JV ball, you don't have the crowd behind you like the varsity does," he said. "Also, the level of competition is not as tough as it is with the varsity. Most of the teams you play are from junior colleges in-state.

"However, it's a good way of gaining experience," he said. "And everyone needs to gain that experience somewhere whether if it's playing varsity or JV."

FOR WOMEN'S basketball player Shelly Woodard, the reason for playing JV ball is like most other JV players. "I couldn't see myself studying all the time and not doing anything else," she said.

Woodard, a 5-foot-10 walk-on from Maize, said, "I wanted to be more active and involved. Since I used to play in high school, I had enough confidence in myself that I decided to go ahead and try out to see whether or not I had a chance of making the squad."

For walk-on Marilee Drouhard, playing JV ball can also be difficult when the team goes on the road. "At first you feel like you're not a part of the team, especially when they (varsity) go on the road and you have to stay behind," she said. "However, after awhile, you begin to adjust to it."

According to Hartman, the chances of a JV player making varsity depend on various circumstances. "It's hard to say," Hartman said. "If it seems that he (the player) has mastered the basic skills of the game, then he has a fairly good chance of making the squad.

HARTMAN POINTED out 6-foot-6 freshman guard Lafayette Watkins. "Watkins has improved tremendously since playing varsity," he said. "It was good for Lafayette to play JV ball. It gave him a general feeling for the game."

"However, since most of these kids are walk-ons, sometimes there can be disadvantages when it comes time to pair them up against our scholarship players, who are sometimes considered to be the 'better player'," Hartman said.

According to Coach Lynn Hickey, the women's basketball program has struggled with organizing a JV program. "We just don't seem to get as many people out as the men do," she said. "This year we needed five players for our JV team and we only had six girls who tried out."

Hickey believes that the women's program is still in a building stage. "Women's

Stop the squabble, support the women

LadyCats, WildKittens, Kitties.....Now that I've managed to make a few of the radical folks on campus a little steamed, a calm, cool sports editor will ensue with a discussion concerning the women's basketball team. I'm referring to that marvelous group of student athletes who currently have the best record at K-State, 20-5.

The above terms have been absent from the Collegian sports page for quite a while. My comrades and I have decided to answer the cry to give women athletes justice.

We've gotten the message through letters to the editor, face-to-face debates, and well-verbalized slams on campus.

Some faculty have made their plea. A few students, male and female alike, have voiced negative opinions, and even my assistant sports editor expressed her dislike of the term.

ALL THE SQUABBLE and debate over a simple term is rather hypocrytical. I mean, the LadyCats, like the LadyJayhawks, the Texas Tech LadyTechsters, the Old Dominion LadyMonarchs, and the UCLA LadyBruins, are all nationally known women's teams with successful programs.

The irony of it all is that K-State's team has been given the prefix "Lady" from within. Head Coach Lynn Hickey was the first to give her team the handle LadyCats. Every member wears a practice jersey that reads LadyCats in big bold living color. And I'm sure that if men's Head Coach Jack Hartman wanted to call his team the "GentlemanCats", area sports writers would not hesitate to use the term in print.

It is my opinion that the term LadyCats has a nice ring to it, and fits K-State's squad very nicely. It has no negative connotation, and is a very useful term to use in print because it allows the reader to easily determine which team is covered in a given story, just by reading the headline.

IT IS ONLY FITTING that the K-State women's team be given a nickname that can be easily noticed. They conduct themselves with a high degree of sophistication, and act like the champions they are.

The sad thing is that K-State students, faculty members, and the general public have failed to give the women's team the credit they deserve.

Ahearn Field House is packed to the rafters for most of the men's games, but only a handful of loyal fans manage to attend women's games. When only 300 to 500 spectators show, the traditionally electrifying Ahearn turns into a dim dungeon fit only for pack rats and barn swallows. This is not a fit atmosphere for a team with 20 wins so far, and is currently on an 11-game winning streak.

With an enviable lineup, Hickey has managed to gain a berth to the NCAA championships, and take the Big Eight Tournament crown.

AND THE WILDCATS are not without their stars either. Working the inside is the always-reliable Tammie Romstad, considered a strong candidate for the Wade Trophy, one the highest honors a female athlete can receive.

Priscilla Gary has intorduced her high-speed style of basketball to K-State. Gary or "Dr. P" as her teammates call her, can turn an 11 point deficit into a five-point lead in a jiffy. And she does it with enough aerial showmanship and fancy dribbling to make the sparse crowds go wild.

There is no excuse not to attend the women's games.

K-State will host three more games this season, with a possibility of playing at home in the first round of the NCAA championships. The first is a rematch with Creighton this Saturday. Next Tuesday, Feb. 23, is the showdown with the LadyJayhawks of Kansas, and the home finale is March 5 with Central Missouri State.

The 'Cats are good, so why not bottle up all that hostility towards the so-called sexist terms, and let off some steam at the women's game this weekend?

Slumping Wildcats face Jayhawks

This season's sequel to the K-State — Kansas basketball classic has arrived. The stage is set in Lawrence for a 2:10 p.m. tipoff on Saturday.

The game will be telecast by TVS/NBC as the Big Eight's Saturday feature of the week.

Neither the 'Cats nor the Jayhawks have enjoyed much in the win column since their last meeting in Manhattan Jan. 23 when K-State routed KU 70-53.

The 'Cats have managed only a 3-4 mark since then, having lost twice to Oklahoma State, and once to Missouri and Oklahoma. K-State defeated Colorado, Iowa State, and Nebraska while waiting for the rematch of the Sunflower Classic. Kansas has mustered a 4-4 mark, splitting with Colorado, falling to Iowa State, Missouri and Oklahoma State, and defeating Alcorn State, Oklahoma and Nebraska. Overall, K-State is 17-6 and 7-4 in the Big Eight, and the Jayhawks are 13-9 and 4-6 respectively.

Although the 'Cats easily handled the Jayhawks on their home court, Head Coach Jack Hartman is not taking Kansas for granted.

"I think Kansas performs very well at home, and their record indicates that," Hartman said. "They have demonstrated quality from their non-conference play as well."

Hartman said that a mid-season slump is normal for a basketball team, but winning a home-court advantage for the Big Eight Tournament will ride on the final three games.

"It's hard to go through a season without some peaks and valleys," Hartman said. "But we're having our low at a very bad time. We have three vitally important games in order to have the home-court advantage, or win a post-season berth.

Kansas stills holds a commanding lead in the series between the two schools, 118-88, but that has been reversed since the formation of the Big Seven 34 years ago. K-State holds that record 46-41. Both schools have split in the last four encounters.

Women aim for win record

The task is obvious for the women's basketball team: defeat Creighton Saturday night at Ahearn Field House and set a new record for consecutive wins for a K-State team.

The Wildcats, 20-5 on the season, have posted 11 consecutive victories. The last setback was on Jan. 7 to the Tennessee Volunteers with a score of was 83-68.

A victory Saturday night would break the record of successive wins held by the 1968-69 squad. The current team is also the 10th straight women's team to earn 20 wins in one season.

K-State Head Coach Lynn Hickey said her team has shown improvement in recent games.

"The team's playing real well now. Basically, we're at the point where we have to keep in good condition and play consistently," Hickey said.

In the win Tuesday night over Drake, 82-74, Priscilla Gary scored 29 points for the 'Cats.

K-State's next opponent, Creighton, had a 6-17 record heading into its game with Nebraska-Omaha Thursday night. K-State walloped the Blue Jays 79-49 a little over a week ago on Creighton's home floor. In that contest, Angie Bonner came off the bench to pour in a career-high 23 points in the winning effort.

Hickey commented on the Blue Jays' talents on the court.

"Creighton doesn't have great size, but they're not really small. They are well coached, aggressive and very scrappy. We'll have to play with intensity and set the tempo," Hickey said.

sports are still relatively new in this country," she said. "Therefore, we are still struggling in getting teams organized on the collegiate level."

ACCORDING TO HARTMAN, the JV program has provided students many ways to display their own talent. "Since all students are eligible to try out, it provides a link between the student body and K-State sports," he said. "It gives students the chance to become more involved with sports at K-State."

Veto

the veto, "one of the most blatant political actions he has taken during his 3½ years as governor."

"There is absolutely no responsible reason for his action," added Lady, an Overland Park Republican. "It was not a political map, in that it was not drawn to favor or hurt any of the current congressmen or either political party.

"It appears that the only recourse left is to pass a map which will be much less popular with the citizens of the state — one that makes major changes and displaces a much greater number of Kansans."

Rep. Robert Frey, (R-Liberal), House majority leader and chairman of the joint reapportionment committee which worked on the issue last summer and fall, was even more critical of the governor.

"A FAIR, reasonable map was sent to the governor, but he chose to ignore it and instead responded to the hue and cry of political hacks to veto the proposal," said Frey.

"The Legislature resolved reapportionment in an open and expeditious manner, and has completely fulfilled their constitutional responsibility. Now, the governor has chosen the low road of ignoring the people and using the governor's office as a headquarters for political cronyism."

Sen. Paul Hess, (R-Wichita), who served on the interim committee last year and was one of the main author of the vetoed plan, said:

"I think it's a wide open ball game now. It really was a status quo map. It wasn't a Republican map."

HESS ALSO said the GOP now has a chance to do some gerrymandering, although he did not use that word.

He said the GOP might be able to help U.S. Rep. Jim Jeffries in the 2nd District of northeast Kansas, who is regarded as in trouble in his bid for a third term this year, and said the possibility of change in the 4th District, which includes Wichita, "will make Glickman sleep lightly at night."

He referred to Rep. Dan Glickman, the only Democrat in Kansas' congressional delegation.

Senate President Ross Doyen said the Senate would now make an attempt to draft a map which meets some of Carlin's objections, but added, "I think it will end up less and less attractive" to the Democrats.

Sen. Jack Steineger, the Senate minority leader from Kansas City, admitted he was pessimistic that a new plan would emerge which would be any better for the Democrats. He said his only hope is that some "more reasoned Republican senators and representatives have had enough of this blatant, partisan game."

STEINEGER SAID his party would "probably have been better off letting it become law and taking it out of the hands of the Legislature; it's probably going to end up in the courts, anyway."

Both Steineger and House Minority Leader Fred Weaver of Baxter Springs said they did not ask Carlin to veto the bill.

But Weaver expressed hope Democrats might have more input now into the drafting of a new plan.

"I'm just hopeful we can sit down now and draw up a suitable map," addd Weaver. "I think we can do that, if they will allow some input from our side of the aisle.

"Obviously if they do something worse to us, I'll be the first one down there asking for a veto. We still have the king of the mountain (Carlin and his veto power)."

IN HIS veto message, Carlin said the Legislature had forgotten the principles of compactness and contiguity in drawing up the first plan — as evidenced by what it did to Wyandotte and Sedgwick Counties.

He also said, "It is obvious from public and private accounts of the genesis of (the vetoed plan) that it was the result of a partisan effort to impose the will of the majority party without bipartisan input."

He told his news conference:

"I want to see some bipartisan effort. To this point, there has been no effort whatsoever to include Democratic input."

Manhattan volunteers for nuclear war filming

Kansas City is hit by a nuclear bomb as a result of an international conflict. Surrounding cities are shown dealing with the consequences and aftermath of the ordeal.

One of those cities could be portrayed by Manhattan, if ABC chooses to film scenes for a made-for-TV movie here, according to a spokeswoman for the Kansas Department of Economic Development (KDED).

Manhattan has put in its bid to be considered as a possible city for filming, said Wendy Schiappa, public affairs director of Manhattan Chamber of Commerce. KDED is working in conjunction with ABC, she said, to find sites for filming.

ABC needs to film scenes revolving around a hospital, university and farming area, Schiappa said.

"I think they (ABC) were especially interested in buildings that could be torn down here," she said.

Representatives from ABC were in Kansas looking at possible sites in mid-November, according to Schiappa. "The only thing that was unfortunate was that we didn't get them to come to Manhattan."

Schiappa said that she did not become aware that ABC was making the movie and looking for settings that could be shot in Manhattan until it was too late to put Manhattan on the schedule to be visited by the representatives.

"I hired a photographer and we went out and took 20 8-by-10 pictures of possible sites," she said. The pictures included farms, demolition sites, the K-State campus and the third floor of St. Mary Hospital. Schiappa said she took the pictures to KDED in Topeka the next day, and they took the photos to Kansas City and gave them to the ABC crew at the airport.

A climatic summary, with wind direction and speed, crop information, aerial photos and topographical maps of Manhattan were sent to KDED upon request at a later date, according to Schiappa.

The movie now has a "generic title" of 'Nuclear War,' according to Jim Butler, ABC press representative. "There has been a script commitment," he said, "so the movie will probably be done.

"Last December they (ABC) were hoping to get started in June or July," he said. "That's not necessarily out of the question." Another script is due to be delivered next month.

Schiappa said that it could be months before filming began, and even then, the first scenes to be filmed would most likely be done in Kansas City, Mo.

It will most likely be longer than two years before the movie will be on television, according to Butler.

Annex

to withdraw his bill.

The Sand bill would prohibit crossing county lines to annex military lands and was drafted as a result of Riley County commissioners' opposition to the annexation.

The amendments Werts has introduced would exempt Riley County from financial impact in certain, but not all, areas, commissioner Rosy Rieger said. State revenue sharing funds would not be exempt, but these losses would be minimal, according to Higgins and Pinaire.

"We know our cities in Riley County would lose some money," Rieger said.

ALTHOUGH NO ONE seemed to know exactly how much money would change hands, Riley County commissioners opposed any of the money leaving the county.

"We do feel responsible to our citizens who reside in our counties and cities," Westervelt said. "There would be impact where they (Junction City officials) say there would not be."

"There's always going to be an impact when there is a change in policy," Rieger said.

Commissioner Marjorie Morse said it would be impossible to anticipate what will happen should the annexation be carried out.

In defense of the plan, Pinaire said financial losses to Riley County would be minimal and that if any future city or county sales taxes were adopted, none of the money would go to Junction City.

"Whether we do it or not, somebody is going to annex it (Fort Riley)," Pinaire said.

HIGGINS AND PINAIRE said they hoped a compromise could be reached by proposing state legislation, the Werts amendments, in answer to the letter Riley County commissioners sent to Junction City commissioners.

"We believe it would not be difficult to have this type of legislation passed," Pinaire said.

Organic farmers hear good, bad USDA news

By MIKE FITZGERALD
Agriculture Editor

NEWTON — Organic farming. For some it may mean farming with horse and wagon, without commercial fertilizers and pesticides. For others, it may mean reducing usage of commercial fertilizers and pesticides and practicing minimum or no-tillage. In any case, the goal is the same — to maintain or increase production levels while acting responsibly toward the resource which makes it all possible, the land.

Garth Youngberg, the U.S. Department of Agriculture coordinator for organic farming, was in Newton Saturday to speak at the Kansas Organic Producers' seventh annual meeting.

In 1980, the USDA did a major investigation of the status and potential for organic farming in the United States. As a result of the study, the coordinator position was created.

YOUNGBERG TOLD the group of nearly 100 that dramatic changes in the nation's awareness of organic farming have occurred in recent years.

"The issue has become important on both the societal and governmental agendas," Youngberg said.

Increasingly, the media is giving attention to the questions surrounding organic farming, he said.

"Lou Harris (of the Harris Poll) recently testified before a congressional hearing and said he sees evidence, the strongest in 25 years, that the public wants to extend the powers of the Clean Ar Act. Sixty-one percent polled felt Congress should moved toward action to save the soil," Youngberg said.

"Forty-four percent of farmers and farm managers in that poll agreed. The Washington Post, which does not serve a rural readership, has even taken to reporting agriculture and organic farming news," he said.

WHAT YOUNGBERG terms as the governmental agenda is receiving increasing consideration.

"The recently passed four-year farm bill in Title 14 calls for establishing integrated research and education programs for organic farming. That title is not enforceable law, it's kind of a wish list. But organic farming has moved from being studied two years ago to becoming language in the farm bill," he said.

The organic farming consideration has not stopped there, according to Youngberg.

"More recently (than the new farm bill) legislation has been introduced by a Congressman, Jim Weaver, of Oregon, which is scheduled to receive committee attention this coming week," he said.

WEAVER'S 1982 Organic Farming Act calls for the establishing organic farming research at six regional universities and an organization of organic farming volunteers with existing systems or experience to serve as advisers to extension agents. The act also calls for the Secretary of Agriculture to continue organic farming literature review at

U.S. troops may end Salvador civil dispute

NEW YORK (AP) — Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), back from a recent trip to El Salvador, said Sunday that without U.S. troops there can be no military solution to the civil dispute that has gripped the Central American nation.

"The Salvadoran (government) forces are not winning now," and will not do so without "basic changes in the opinions of the people" or the aid of U.S. ground forces, Leahy said in an interview on ABC's "This Week with David Brinkley."

He said Congress would not support the commitment of U.S. troops in El Salvador, where leftist guerillas are trying to topple a military-civilian junta.

Robert White, former U.S. ambassador to El Salvador, called for negotiations to replace next month's "flawed election" there. He said the election would not allow participation by leftist candidates who are supported by 20 to 30 percent of the population.

White said that because of the strength of the right wing, "any candidate who campaigned on the basis of peace and reconciliation ... would be shot down by the military in two days."

He said the primary impact of the elections would be to weaken moderates and strengthen the extreme right.

Like White, Leahy called for negotiations and a major reassessment of U.S. policy — including military aid — after the election with an eye toward encouraging talks between various factions in El Salvador.

Also during the program, the secretary general of the Organization of American States urged the United States to "show interest" in El Salvador events but "not participate directly."

"The Salvadorans must find the solution to their own problems," said Alejandro Orfila.

Lords, ladies, robots gather at Imagin Con

By STEWART BOWERSOX
Collegian Reporter

"Rock chalk chickenhawk" wasn't the only chant students were yelling this weekend. "Blood makes the grass grow — kill, kill, kill," rang out in the Union Ballroom, along with "more gore, more gore."

Those cheers were chanted during medieval combat demonstrations at the Imagin Con festival Saturday. The Imagin Con, sponsored by K-State Gaming Council, Foresight Unlimited and the Shire of the Spinning Winds, was a fantasy festival held in the Union this weekend.

Members of the Shire of the Spinning Winds presented medieval demonstrations. The Shire is the local branch of a national organization, Society for Creative Anachronism (SCA), according to Samuel Mize, (Lord Leric Speltighe), graduate in computer science.

"The Shire of the Spinning Winds was started about four years ago in Manhattan," Mize said.

SCA BEGAN IN California about 16 years ago and has grown from a single costume party to a nationwide organization of "medievalists" — people who recreate the feasts, combat tournaments, arts and anything related to the medieval period, Mize said.

At the weekend Imagin Con festival, there were three SCA branches represented — Manhattan, Wichita and Kansas City.

In the costume contest, Virgina Sooby, senior in music education, wore a 16th century-type dress that won first place. Soby is known as Gwendolyn Fairfax to the members of Shire of the Spinning Winds.

"What's an old fart like me doing in this type of costume?" Robert Mize (Lord Trobere Oakseed), a tax consultant from Kansas City, said. "Well, my son got involved several years ago and it just kind of started to rub off. So my lady and I tried it. We found it was beautiful escapism.

"I am 55 years old, and there are several people my age or older in my branch (of SCA) that I am aware of. But the young people accept us and we accept them," he said.

In addition to the medieval combat and the costume contest, there were fencing demonstrations.

"We've been trying to get a group of fencers at K-State for several years, but fencing is something that you have to keep up with to master, and it requires a lot of time," Ronald Nolder, sophomore in general business administration, said.

Watt reverses exploration policy

WASHINGTON — Interior Secretary James Watt, in what appeared to be a major policy reversal, said Sunday that the Reagan administration wants a moratorium on drilling and mining in wilderness areas until the end of the century.

Catching environmentalists off guard, Watt said the administration would propose legislation this week to amend the 1964 Wilderness Act to protect the 80 million acres of land from developers until the year 2000.

Under the present law, the land would be permanently off limits for exploration and development after Dec. 31, 1983. But Watt said the nation's "vulnerability to a natural resources attack or war" requires a new look in 2000.

Watt previously had advocated letting the Interior Department issue leases for wilderness exploration and development through the year 2003, a position that environmentalists and others had opposed.

Watt, speaking on NBC's "Meet the Press" program, said the legislation will include a provision that would allow a president, with the consent of Congress, to withdraw whatever acreage might be required to meet "a national need" for oil, natural gas, strategic minerals or timber.

Nuclear plant officials list cause of alert

HARRISBURG, Pa. — The operators of the damaged Three Mile Island nuclear plant said Sunday they are almost certain there never was a buildup of combustible gases inside the plant last week.

Rather, they said, radio interference apparently caused a malfunction in monitors that indicated a hydrogen gas buildup and a low oxygen level inside the plant Friday.

Doug Bedell, spokesman for the plant's owners, said laboratory test results released Sunday appeared to confirm the theory that radio interference caused the problem in Unit 2.

The readings prompted operators to declare a low-level emergency for fear a gas buildup could explode.

Three Mile Island's Unit 2 is the one crippled in the nation's worst commercial nuclear accident in March 1979. A $1 billion decontamination effort is under way and is not expected to end for several years.

Top Chinese official to resign

PEKING — China's top political figure Deng Xiaoping will resign as vice chairman of the Communist Party later this year to make room for younger leaders, Chinese sources said Sunday.

Party Chairman Hu Yaobang disclosed the 77-year-old Deng's decision last month in a speech to leaders of the Communist Youth League, league sources said.

They said Deng is expected to lead a central committee advisory group after turning in his resignation at the 12th Communist Party Congress. The date for the congress has not been announced.

Deng's overriding goal is to streamline the central bureaucracy, which has more than 1,000 ministers and vice ministers, to make the government more efficient and end the system of lifetime tenure.

Man wounds IRS agent, then kills self

NORTHRIDGE, Calif. — A man who feared the tax agent next door had turned him in for tax evasion broke through the neighbor's dining room window Sunday, shot and wounded the agent and his wife and went home and took his own life, the authorities said.

Frank Saltzman, 51, carried out the attack at about 3 a.m. while his neighbors slept, police said. The Internal Revenue Service agent and his wife were hospitalized in serious but stable condition.

"Mr. Saltzman apparently hasn't paid his taxes for quite a number of years and he believed his next-door neighbor had turned him in to the Internal Revenue," police Lt. Vern Higbee said. "He didn't want his family to live in poverty and so he was going to take (kill) himself ad his next-door neighbor."

The agent, Marvin Chotiner, was treated for a bullet wound of the arm; his wife, Julie, had surgery for a wound in her abdomen, police said.

Stewart receives Berlin Film Festival award

BERLIN — Actor James Stewart has been awarded a special "Golden Bear" — the top award at the Berlin Film Festival — for his services to cinema.

Stewart, 74, received the award Saturday night from West German actor Bernhard Wicki.

Hundreds of critics and stars assembled for the week-long film festival gave Stewart a warm ovation last several minutes. The audience then settled down to enjoy one of Stewart's most famous films "Philadelphia Story," co-starring Cary Grant and Katharine Hepburn.

The film was one of several starring Stewart shown at the festival.

Long live free speech. Because of it, we see Iranians and Americans arguing and cussing, but also exchanging views. Perhaps a few more people now understand that this world cannot be viewed with accuracy through religious ideals or patriotic zeal. Because of free speech, perhaps a few more people realize that they would probably do what the other fellow is doing, if they were in a similar situation.

I salute those lucky people who can speak freely and who also possess that powerful tool, the bane of dictators, religious conservatives and simplistic thinkers of whatever persuasion, known as the "open mind." I salute those people who are willing to search through the mud and muck of an ideologue's rhetoric, in order to find that speck of truth.

So, open-minded free-speakers and ideologues alike, get together to discuss the irony and the tragedy in this world, but above all remember to poke fun at generalizations, which don't tell the complete story.

Feel free to begin with what you have read here.

Bullet production is paradoxical

Technological and scientific advances have enhanced life by wiping out several diseases, increasing literacy and linking seven continents. Yet scientific advances that widen life's boundaries can also present new problems that humans must learn to live with or cease to exist.

An example of such a paradox has surfaced with the creation and use of brass bullets with Teflon tips, KTWs. The same material that draws praise from cooks and dishwashers for its gourmet results and easy care has been introduced into the world of firearms.

The KTW bullet was developed for use by law enforcers. The developers were seeking a solution to the problem that police bullets could not penetrate automobiles, thus increasing the danger for bystanders with straying bullets and decreasing their ability to stop fleeing criminals. The Teflon tip enables the bullet to penetrate almost anything, including automobile engines and four bulletproof vests.

Distribution plans called for careful marketing to police agencies and overseas only. However, the bullets have already appeared in wholesale and retail markets across the U.S. Kansas and California legislatures have heard appeals for action in decreasing the availability of this technological development that is capable of blowing up in the face of law enforcers.

Kansas law enforcement representatives have appeared before the House Judiciary Committee, as reported by the Associated Press, calling for a bill that would make it illegal to manufacture, sell, purchase or use bullets with tips covered with either Teflon or nylon. Newsweek reports that California legislator Ed Davis has introduced a bill adding three years to the sentence of anyone caught using a KTW in a crime.

This is only an additional chapter in the text recording the technological developments by science which eventually serve as additional threats to life. Officers enforcing and protecting the law face death each day. The odds against them seem to be increasing.

Register under protest

Editor,

In the Feb. 17 Collegian there was an article which contained commentary designed to frighten those students who may not have registered for the draft into doing so. I would like to comment on the remarks of Mr. Elder, director of the Kansas Selective Service, concerning possible penalties for non-registration.

Students should recognize two major points. First, as Mr. Elder pointed out, violators will almost certainly be given a chance to register before any legal action is taken against them. By waiting to register until you are forced to do so, you can delay the system and thus ledge a concrete protest against this violation of your basic rights. Secondly, you should recognize that there are not enough jail cells to hold all the violators of this statute, and thus only selected and highly publicized examples are ever likely to be incarcerated.

If you agree that this politically-motivated law is a violation of your rights but feel compelled to obey the law and register, I would urge you to write "registering under protest," "conscientous objector" or other appropriate messages at the bottom of your registration card. If you let them turn you into a number without even a protest, later resistance will be that much harder.

Our country has never recognized a peace-time draft as legitimate, but many voices are now calling for this very thing. I hope those who fear the new shift toward militarism will resist to the extent they feel appropriate before it is too late.

Names, times: they are a changing

All things change. The least of which is not the weather. But since many of you may opt to head for Tuttle as opposed to classes, I need not speak of its magnificence. However, be you at Tuttle, campus lawn, back yard, or inside dreaming of being at one of the above, I want to entertain for you some thoughts on change.

As I've said, all things change. You may think this is untrue. You say, take for example a rock, a piece of steel, mountains, or the oceans, they don't change. The fact is though, all things do change, some faster than others.

I'm not usually in favor of the status quo and am usually a proponent of questioning the establishment. Today however, in the case of change, I don't particularly feel like fighting it. In the spirit of spring-fever, I'll go with the flow. I want to propose pushing nature's abounding spirit of change a bit and apply it to some of our customs and traditions.

WHAT IF WE were to change our birthdays and names? Before you pass the idea off as total non-sense, consider that names can and are changed everyday, some legally and some not so legally.

If you're wondering what the point of this article is going to be, it's that I'm proposing that any of you who feel inclined to try something new, change either or both your name or birthday today.

I've done both. I discovered today is Sean O'Faolain's birthday. Sean you see, is a noted Irish author born on this day in 1900, who has written about the changes his country has seen in their rebellion. Why don't I go a step further, I think I will. I'll change my nationality too. Consider me a full-blooded Irishman named Sean. Oh, I feel the thirst of a celebration!

BEFORE YOU GO changing your name or birthday, let me offer a few matters for consideration.

If you don't change it today, you may want to avoid doing it near Christmas. To do so increases the likelihood of being short-changed on rations of gifts. People have a kind way of combining the two.

Parents may want to declare all their children's birthdays on the same day, they could stage one big party and be done with it. Or better yet, change them to Christmas day. The two days of celebration could be done on one day with one set of gifts to cover both occasions.

THOSE OF YOU with birthdays under a zodiac sign or personality which doesn't seem to fit your style or character, there is hope. You can change to a more appropriate one. Or if you prefer, change your personality.

You'll want to avoid changing to February 29 — leap year can be a major shortchange too.

You'll want to reconsider days after major national holidays such as New Year's, the Fourth of July, and the like. The hazard there lies in the possibility that during celebration recoveries, your day may be passed unnoticed. Or worse yet you may forget and all of this would be for nothing.

Changing to birthdays of famous people should be cautioned too. A case in point is today, George Washington's birthday. The problem being you never can be sure what day you should celebrate.

GEORGE, TO THIS DAY, is probably confused himself. He has several birthdays. February 11, 1731 is listed as his birthday on the Julian calander, used in England until after the colonies were settled. February 22, 1732 is listed as his birthday on the Georgian calander, adopted by the English during his lifetime. If that wasn't enough reason for him to live it up, we've given him a few more.

In 1971 Congress enacted Public Law 90-363 which changes observance of his birthday to the third Monday of this month. Chances are George is popular in the Big White House in the Sky, because any given day he claims it's his birthday, everyone has unqualified reason to join him in the hoop-la.

For those with identity problems, changing to the birthday of a famous person could help. They'd be able to join in on the celebration without having to give reasons why. But if that didn't quite solve the problem they need only change their names too.

Go for a bit of gusto, change your name or birthday. But in doing so, use a bit of discretion. Changing two of our main means of identification could cause chaotic confusion if your new day and identity would fall upon the event of a job interview, a test, going to the hospital for surgery, or going to court.

If your little adventure should get you into any little bits of trouble, just tell those concerned that Sean told you to do it.

Playboy dehumanizes, exploits

Editor,

I have a few brief comments which I would like to share about Deanna Hutchison's opinion, Feb. 15 Collegian.

It is implicit that Ms. Hutchison's basic assumption is that the benefits which may accrue to the University as a result of the Playboy pictorial outweigh the costs of the exploitation of the six pictured women. I find it unbelievable that she could hold to such a position. How can we place a value on "showing off" K-State which has as its cost the dehumanization and exploitation of six human beings?

In stating that we should "ignore the sexism" she is advocating precisely what the publishers of Playboy want. They want us to think that by coming here they're doing us some great favor. They hope we'll be fooled by their facade of glamour and harmlessness and, while we wear our blinders and act blessed by their presence, many K-State women will gratefully prostitute themselves before Hugh Hefner's mighty empire. This is exactly what Ms. Hutchison suggests we do. I hope only a few are so easily fooled.

It is also unbelievably naive for her to think that the men who will buy that issue of Playboy care anything about the "more deserving" aspects of K-State.

Yes, Ms. Hutchison, the essence of the University will "shine through" in the Playboy pictorial, but is it the kind of essence we want to shine through? I think not.

Gas bills cause charges of 'backdoor decontrol'

WASHINGTON (AP) — As millions of Americans struggled to cope with record high heating bills during one of the coldest winters of the century, an obscure federal agency was moving to speed up the decontrol of natural gas prices, consumer groups charge.

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, a five-member independent panel, is responsible for enforcing the 1978 Natural Gas Policy Act, which calls for the phased-in removal of price controls on about 60 percent of U.S. gas supplies.

But what has consumer groups upset are actions the commission has taken or is considering that will make prices rise much faster.

Critics say FERC, led by Chairman Charles Butler, is embarking on a plan of "backdoor decontrol" to accomplish administratively what President Reagan has been unable to get through Congress.

Reagan appointed three of the agency's five members.

Consumer groups complain that FERC:

— During one of the winter's worst cold waves, announced it was doubling the price for offshore gas found in 300-foot water.

— Gave notice that it was considering raising the price of gas found at 10,000 feet to 15,000 feet. The consumer group Energy Action Project charged that alone could cost customers $18 billion.

— Said that next month it will consider raising prices of "old gas" — found before April 1977 — from as little as 60 cents per thousand cubic feet to $4.

While estimates of how much gas would be covered vary from 25 percent to 50 percent, critics are uniform in their complaint that FERC is going beyond its authority.

"The commission is being used to usurp the power of Congress," said Edwin Rothschild, director of Energy Action. "This is the administration's way of decontrolling gas without going to Congress."

FERC officials say the commission is acting completely within its authority to adjust the prices of natural gas. Butler has warned of severe inequities in price and supply between regions of the country because of faults in the current decontrol program.

"This is not backdoor decontrol," said commission spokeswoman Rachelle Paterson. "There is no way we have the authority for that. These are just modest steps Chairman Butler feels should be considered to address some of the problems under the current law."

Natural gas supplies 55 percent of American homes with their heat and those homes are being hit by a combination of unusually severe weather and prices which have risen 75 percent in three years since phased decontrol began.

In the Washington area, where most congressmen have homes, the average customer will pay $172 for natural gas used in January, a 45 percent increase over a year ago.

Polish government outlines new trade union guidelines

WARSAW, Poland (AP) — The military government outlined guidelines Sunday for reactivating trade unions, declaring they must abandon any political "ambitions" and use strikes only as the "ultimate measure" in labor disputes.

The statement coincided with an announcement in Moscow that Polish martial law chief Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski will visit the Soviet Union in early March.

No date or agenda was set for the trip, reported by the official Soviet news agency Tass, but Jaruzelski was almost certain to meet with Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev.

The trade union guidelines came as the policy-setting Communist Party Central Committee prepared to meet for the first time since martial law was declared Dec. 13.

At the same time, Roman Catholic bishops from across Poland were expected to meet in Warsaw to forge church policy toward martial law authorities following Primate Jozef Glemp's return from the Vatican, where he recently met with Pope John Paul II.

In Rome, an Italian newspaper which had been granted an exclusive interview with the Polish-born pope on Sunday quoted John Paul as saying that as a Pole, he "cannot miss" visiting his homeland in August for the 600th anniversary of the Black Madonna shrine. A papal aide said the Vatican had received no word from the military on whether an invitation issued before martial law was still in effect.

The government's union guidelines were published by the Polish news agency PAP. The guidelines restrict the right to strike, won by workers during August 1980 protests that led to formation of Solidarity in the Gdansk shipyards. The government said walkouts will be permitted only as the "ultimate measure."

All unions were suspended in the crackdown, including the independent labor federation Solidarity, and many union activists were interned, among them Solidarity chief Lech Walesa.

PAP said the rules would be offered for discussion in plants and institutions and officials would listen "carefully" from "honest working men," but not to "determined enemies of socialism."

Parking council proposes new rules to stop storage

Get set for more parking regulations.

If recommendations made by the Traffic and Parking Council are approved, several new clauses will be added to the University parking regulations.

Storage parking was one of the main points discussed Friday during the council's meeting. The council proposed that a clause be added to the University parking regulations pertaining to vehicles left uattended.

The clause will state that vehicles left for over 48 hours without being moved will be considered to be in unauthorized storage.

The problem area where this occurs is in the free lots. Vehicles left in those lots can be excluded if Security and Traffic is notified that the owner is on University business. The other exclusion would be residence hall parking lots.

The council also proposed adding a clause dealing with illegal registration of vehicles. The council said this clause would be aimed at people who obtain a parking permit while living in a residence hall.

Another topic brought up during Friday's meeting was the possibility of issuing a special parking permit for short-term classes, five days or longer, at half of the cost of semester rates.

The council said that on July 1, parking area No. 2 in the West Stadium parking area will be changed from a free lot to a pay lot.

All these changes have been recommended by the Traffic and Parking Council and are subject to University and the Board of Regents approval, according to Charles Long, assistant professor of extension horticulture and council chairman.

'Cats dump slump atop KU 'Hawks

LAWRENCE — K-State's men took their slumping season right to the doorstep of the Kansas Jayhawks Saturday and dumped it there to wither and die.

Putting the last few weeks of play behind them, the Wildcats, behind excellent play from Tim Jankovich, took it right to the 'Hawks for a rejuvenating 63-53 romp.

It was like the 'Cats took a step back in time — back to the early days of the 1980-81 season when confidence was the key, and winning was not that much of a task.

After struggling at Iowa State and falling apart at home against Oklahoma State, the rigors of losing a squeaker to Missouri are over and the 'Cats are ready for a new beginning.

And defeating the 'Hawks couldn't have been a better birthday present for Wildcat forward Ed Nealy, who turned 22 Friday. Nealy said the 'Cats are geared for a big finish.

"We still thought we had a chance to tie for the Big Eight title," Nealy said. "But we barely held off Iowa State, and against Oklahoma State, we started good, but didn't finish the game.

"Today is the first step. We played hard and it helped our confidence. It was a good win and we're happy."

WILDCAT SHOOTING did a lot to muffle crowd noise in the early going. But the 'Cats were not without their cheering section. Every Kansas score was followed with roars of approval from Jayhawk fans. But just as impressive was a comparably explosive cheer from the south end of Allen Field House where a good share of the K-State fans were seated.

Jankovich snatched the opening tip and set up offense against the KU 2-3 zone defense.

For nearly a minute and a half, the 'Cats worked the ball around the zone in search of an opening score. Tyrone Adams found the mark with 18:33 remaining when he popped one home from 17 feet on the left side of the key. The next time down, Randy Reed connected from 15 feet, and K-State led 4-0 three minutes into the game.

The Jayhawks looked to David Magley to bring them out of their early deficit. The 6-8 forward grabbed a rebound at the 18-minute mark, drove the length of the court, and four seconds later, got the 'Hawks on the board with a high-speed lay-in. Magley also picked up a free throw on a foul by Les Craft.

THE WILDCATS failed to counter on their possession. Magley took an assist from Tony Guy and hit an 18-foot jumper from the left corner, and the 'Hawks were in front 5-4 with 17:02 left in the first half.

Adams had a hot hand for the Wildcats. The 6-6 guard hit five of six tries in the first half and finished the game shooting 66 percent with 16 points.

Jankovich then hit his first shot with 11:33 left in the first half on a 17-foot jumper from the corner. He turned a pass from Adams into a 15-foot score at the 11-minute mark and doubled the Wildcats' lead 14-7.

Jeff Dishman drew a foul from K-State's Lafayette Watkins and sank the first half of a one-and-one. Magley then sank another 17-foot jumper at the 10:04 mark.

REED REGAINED some momentum for K-State when he posted the first of his three slams dunks with 9:26 remaining.

The Jayhawks came right back, however, and with 3:35 to play in the half, Guy picked off a cross-court pass from the 'Cats, passed to Tyke Peacock who hit Magley for a layup. This tied the score at 22.

The Jayhawks adopted the policy to get into a running game against K-State. Kansas Head Coach Ted Owens believed the key to the game was when the score was tied late in the first half.

"I think the turning point in the game was when we closed it to 22 all," Owens said. "We had the momentum. Then we let them (K-State) slip out with a six-point lead at halftime."

THE WILDCATS turned the game around in the final three minutes of the half. Reed drove the lane with 2:58 to go to put the 'Cats up by two, 24-22. Watkins was fouled by Kelly Knight with 1:27 left. The freshman forward made two free throws to double the lead. Peacock made the score 26-24, hitting a 20-foot jump shot.

K-State went to the dressing room with a 30-24 lead.

Wildcats Head Coach Jack Hartman was pleased with his team's performance.

"I knew it would be a very active game," Hartman said. "We came out in both halves with a lot of enthusiasm, but we really played well in the second half."

For the first eight minutes in the half, the only thing KU could put on the board were team fouls. The 'Hawks came out stone cold. Their offense was working well, but shots weren't falling. Magley kept the ball alive with good rebounding. In fact, he grabbed a career-high 15 for the game.

But it took the Jayhawks only three minutes to post five team fouls, and Knight was on the bench with four.

The 'Cats are now 18-6 on the season and 8-4 in the Big Eight. Kansas is 13-10 and 4-6 in conference play.

Next action for K-State is Wednesday against the Missouri Tigers in Columbia, Mo.

K-State 7 0-2 14, Nealy 2 1-2 5, Craft 1 1-4 3, Adams 6 4-4 16, Jankovich 6 7-8 19, Watkins 2 2-2 6, Galvao 0 0-0 0, Williams 0 0-2 0 Totals 24 15-24 63

Women breeze by Creighton

The women's basketball team came out running and gunning Saturday night as they crushed the Creighton Blue Jays 89-36 at Ahearn Field House.

The victory was the team's 12th straight, a new K-State record. The Wildcats' record stands at 21-5 overall.

Creighton, 6-19 and losers of seven in a row, never led in the contest. The Blue Jays have now lost 12 games by 20 points or more this season.

K-State Head Coach Lynn Hickey expressed her feelings on the record-breaking win.

"Everybody played very well. Our practices had been good all week and I think we were ready to play," Hickey said.

The Wildcats were led in scoring by Tammie Romstad. The senior center scored 25 points, most of them from the inside. She canned 12 of 15 attempts from the floor. Priscilla Gary tallied 12 points while Barbara Gilmore, Jean Roise and Angie Bonner each put in 10.

Creighton was paced by Ruth Beyerhelm's nine points. In the game, Beyerhelm became Creighton's all-time leading scorer. The 5-foot-10 sophomore has collected 652 points in her career with the Blue Jays.

K-State shot a season-high 62 percent from the field. The 'Cats hit a total of 39 out of 62 for the game. They also set a mark for free-throw shooting, hitting all 11 of their attempts. Creighton managed to hit only 16 of 54 attempts for a dismal 29 percent.

In the first half, K-State pulled ahead 6-0 on three baskets by Romstad. Creighton went five minutes without a score when Beyerhelm's jumper made the score 6-2. Beyerhelm put in another bucket minutes later, cutting the K-State lead to 8-6, the closest the Blue Jays would get the remainder of the game.

The next 17 points belonged to the Wildcats as they built a 25-6 advantage with 7:37 left in the half. Romstad scored nine of the points during the spurt and Gary added four. Creighton went six minutes without scoring in the stretch.

The Wildcats shot a warm 64 percent in the first half, compared to Creighton's cool 36 percent from the field. Romstad had 17 points in the first half of action for the 'Cats.

the national level and to issue an annual report of what progress has been made for supporting organic farming, according to Youngberg.

The Department of Interior is supporting the USDA by authorizing it to conduct organic farming research on some of the Interior Department's wildlife refuges, Youngberg said.

"That doesn't mean everyone in Washington is taking it seriously, but there are anywhere from eight to 15 Congressmen in both houses who are taking this thing very seriously."

WIDE-SPREAD ADOPTION of organic farming poses some interesting questions and obstacles, Youngberg said.

"What if 30 percent of all corn and soybean acres were put out of production due to organic farming's practice of rotation? Corn production would be down 14 percent and the price would rise 28 percent. Soybean production would drop 17 percent and the price would rise 53 percent," Youngberg said.

"Those figures speak nothing of how the livestock industry and chemical fertilizer and pesticide industries would be affected. There is a lot that is involved here," he said.

There is no question that organic farming is going to play a role in the future of agriculture, but that does not mean it is going to be a 100 percent change from the current farming system, Youngberg added.

In a discussion following his talk, Youngberg was asked what was to be done for organic farmers who are being penalized by the current set-aside program in the farm bill by not being certified for loans despite reducing the number of crop acres which could be planted.

"That's definitely a problem that will have to be addressed," he said.

YOUNGBERG WAS ALSO asked if the Reagan administration was not sending contradicting messages about its interest in helping organic farmers as evidenced by: establishing of an organic farming coordinator who has no staff; the Interior Department offering wildlife refuge research, yet opening public lands to private industry explorations; the farm bill containing organic farming language which is not enforceable; and the Secretary of Agriculture does not practice organic farming on his own Illinois farm.

"That's a good question, but I cannot speak for the administration," Youngberg said.

"The Secretary hasn't said anything regarding organic farming, for or against. You have to realize he's just gotten the farm bill passed and has been traveling to try to expand export markets."

YOUNGBERG SAID he hopes to develop data organic farmers can use.

"We have the 1980 study to guide us and the 10 scientists from different agriculture disciplines I hope to gather, are firmly committed to coming up with some real, applicable data."

Youngberg is a confident but modest man who said the mvement does not depend upon him.

"This thing is alive by itself and if my office were to be cut tomorrow it would continue. There are a lot of people on both sides and many in Washington thinking seriously about it."

The most effective thing for organic farmers to do is to write Weaver and their Congressman and express their support for additional action on the matter, Youngberg said.

Imagin

THE GAMING COUNCIL held a Dungeons and Dragons (D&D) Tournament Friday and Saturday.

"Dungeons and Dragons is a fantasy role-playing game. It was the first role-playing game to come out," Ann Simony, senior in biology, said. "A D&D game can go on for years because the main purpose of the game is to advance your character and you can keep advancing your character and never finish."

A D&D Tournament is run on a time limit. The participant gets his points by killing dragons and accumulating treasure. The person with the most points at the end of the tournament is the winner, Simony said.

Another element of the colorful fantasy festival was a belly dancing presentation given by the Caravan Dancers, of Manhattan.

"Belly dancing is a dance that originated in the Middle East thousands of years ago," Rasha, a belly dance instructor, said. "The medieval knights, I am sure, came in contact with th belly dancing when they went on crusades to the East. I am almost certain that they even took dance back to their lands."

The futuristic aspect of fantasy was also represented at the Imagin Con festival. Foresight Unlimited is a new organization whose goals include creating science fiction and fantasy conventions that are open to the public for its enjoyment and participation. Another goal of the organization is to demonstrate the link between reality and science fiction and fantasy.

Two types of robots, the industrial robot and the R2D2 type, were represented at the Imagin Con.

"Robots will be a very important part of society in the next couple of years," according to Bill Dawes, assistant professor of engineering technology. "The nice thing about a robot is that it never gets hungry, never gets thirsty, it doesn't ask for a raise, doesn't want a coffee break, never goes on strike, and it can work in very hot places or dangerous places."

The industrial robot displayed at the festival was built by students in the Industrial Microprocessing class.

"The reason that the microprocessing class built the robots was to give the students the opportunity to program a robot," Dawes said. "This is something they will need to be able to do."

The fantasy, fiction and fun of the Imagin Con concluded Sunday with an awards ceremony.

Williams denies charges

ATLANTA (AP) — A "scared" Wayne Williams took the stand at his murder trial Monday and told the jury, "I haven't killed anyone."

He also denied he was a homosexual and said he had "never seen" the two young blacks he is accused of murdering.

"I haven't killed anyone," the 23-year-old defendant said. "I haven't thought about it. I don't plan to do it to nobody."

Williams, a black free-lance photographer and self-styled talent promoter, walked to the witness stand in the ninth week of his murder trial immediately after prosecutors finished cross-examining his 64-year-old mother, Faye Williams.

Speculation had abounded at the sensational trial as to whether Williams would testify, since by calling him to the stand his lawyers make it possible for the prosecution to cross-examine him. Because of a gag order, neither side was allowed to make public its plans for calling witnesses.

WILLIAMS TESTIFIED an hour and 55 minutes before court recessed late for the day at 6 p.m. He is to resume testimony Tuesday morning.

"Have you ever taken your hand and put it around someone's neck and choked him to death?" defense attorney Alvin Binder asked him.

"Never," Williams replied.

"Have you ever taken a knife in your hand and put it in someone else's body?"

"No," he answered.

"Have you ever taken a rope and put that around someone's neck, and squeezed it till they were dead?"

"No sir," he replied.

Williams, wearing a dark blue suit with no tie, introduced himself in a low voice, and Binder asked him to speak up.

"I'm scared," he replied. Although he said he was nervous, he appeared calm on the stand.

WILLIAMS HAS pleaded innocent to murdering Nathaniel Cater, 27, and Jimmy Ray Payne, 21, two of 28 young blacks whose deaths over 22 months were investigated by a special police task force.

No arrests have been made in the 26 other cases, but prosecutors have presented evidence in 10 additional slayings in an attempt to show a pattern that may include the Cater and Payne deaths.

Williams said the prosecution version of his pre-dawn encounter with a police stakeout team at a Chattahoochee River bridge was false.

Members of the stakeout team testified that Williams' car was moving slowly across the bridge with its lights off just after they heard a splash in the water about 3 a.m. last May 21. Prosecutors contend the splash was Cater's body, which was found downstream two days later.

BUT WILLIAMS said he drove across the bridge at 20 mph to 30 mph with his car lights on.

Asked how he would described himself, Williams told the jury, "I would characterize myself as a care-free, happy-go-lucky person. Nothing ever bothered me."

He denied he is a homosexual — which is important to the case because prosecutors say homosexuality figured in some of the slayings. "I don't have a grudge against them (homosexuals) as long as they keep their hands to themselves and don't come near me."

Williams said a black teenager who had testified earlier that Williams offered him money for a sex act is a "baldfaced liar."

He also denied a statement by another prosecution witness that he had been seen holding hands with one of the two victims. "I haven't been holding hands with no man," he said.

WILLIAMS FURTHER denied prosecution contentions he hated poor blacks and had made derogatory statements about members of his own race.

Commission to consider date for pool bond vote

Manhattan city commissioners will hold a special meeting at 4 p.m. today to set the date for the Westside Swimming Pool bond election.

At the Feb. 16 commission meeting, April 6 was discussed as a possible date for the bond election.

According to William Frost, Manhattan city attorney, the special meeting was called because the commissioners must conduct a second reading of the proposal before March 3 in order to get the election scheduled.

Also scheduled for the meeting, the Parks and Recreation Advisory Board will present recommendations to change the priorities of the 1982 capital improvements program at Sunset Zoo.

The changes are necessary because general revenue sharing funds allocated for the zoo were redirected for the new senior citizen's center.

A proposal to purchase civil defense siren equipment, which was tabled last week, will be reconsidered by commissioners after bids are examined.

Commissioners are expected to accept the resignation of Bob Newsome from the Parks and Recreation Advisory Board. For his replacement, a representative from the school board is to be considered.

Slattery joins 2nd District House race

By LESLIE PHELPS
Government Affairs Editor

In the first formal announcement of his campaign, Jim Slattery of Topeka declared his candidacy for U.S. representative from the 2nd Congressional District Monday in Manhattan.

Slattery, 33, is the first Democratic candidate to announce for his party's nomination to oppose Republican Jim Jeffries in the November general election. Jeffries is from Atchison and Slattery's hometown is Good Intent, located in Atchinson County.

"My decision to re-enter public service has been the most difficult decision of my life," Slattery said. He served in the Kansas House of Representatives from 1972 to 1978 and then decided not to seek re-election. While serving there, he was the first Democrat to be elected speaker pro tem of the House and the chief sponsor of an income tax reform bill.

SLATTERY GRADUATED in 1970 from Washburn University with a political science degree and received his law degree from Washburn in 1974. Before his decision to run for Congress, Slattery was president of a Topeka real estate company.

"Now is the time for all of us to get off the sideline and onto the field," Slattery said of his decision to enter politics again.

Slattery said the No. 1 domestic priority would be to strengthen the economy.

"The economic engine of this country is in danger of burning up. The government has one foot on the accelerator and one foot on the brake," Slattery said.

He said one step toward solving economic

House committee hears testimony against Fort Riley annexation plan

TOPEKA (AP) — A proposal to stop Junction City from its planned annexation of the Fort Riley army base was welcomed Monday by a crowd of Riley and Geary county residents and officials who paraded through a House committee in support of the measure.

Turnout was heavy in the House Local Government Committee for debate on the committee-sponsored measure which would prohibit a city from crossing county lines to annex federal land.

Darrell Westervelt, chairman of the Riley County Commission, said the measure was needed because the annexation would cause tax revenues to be unfairly shifted from Riley County to Junction City.

"If Junction City is allowed to annex Fort Riley, our local government will lose revenue and in the long run our citizens will pay higher local taxes," Westervelt said.

If the annexation is allowed, Riley County would be forced to share with Junction City its property tax monies, city-county highway fund monies and county-city revenue sharing funds doled out by the state, Westervelt said.

Besides the state money, Junction City would collect about $15 per person for each resident of Fort Riley in federal revenue sharing money. That equals about $315,000 based on a population at the fort of about 21,000 people.

Ogden Mayor Wayne Henson told the committee that 60 percent of the land at Fort Riley and two-thirds of the fort's residents actually live in Riley County. He labeled the attempted annexation "barbarian" and said it was "not at all befitting the conduct of civilized people."

Keith Devaney, spokesman for the Geary County Commission, said his panel supported the proposal to block the annexation and said his county would lose $150,000 in revenues if the move is allowed.

Rep. James Braden (R-Wakefield) testified in support of the measure, and offered an amendment that would simply outlaw the annexation of any military reservation in the state.

Otherwise, Braden said he would support the proposal in behalf of his constituents in Ogden.

Opponents of the measure, the Junction City attorney and a city councilman, said the annexation would not have the financial shift predicted by Riley County officials.

In fact, Richard Pinaire, Junction City attorney, said legislation would be introduced soon to protect Riley County from any substantial revenue shift to Junction City.

He said proposals would be sponsored by Sen. Merrill Werts (R-Junction City).

Pinaire said the annexation would benefit the city and the fort, and not affect Riley County or cities in the county.

Court dismisses Cooke espionage case

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Court of Military Appeals ordered Monday the dismissal of the espionage case against 2nd Lt. Christopher Cooke on grounds that the Air Force improperly extracted his "confession" about conveying secrets to the Soviet Union.

Cooke was released, hours later, from the stockade at nearby Fort Meade, Md., an Army post. Defense attorney F. Lee Bailey said via telephone from Florida that his client promptly "signed his resignation" from the Air Force, then headed for home in Richmond, Va.

After nightfall, the Department of Defense said that because it "has no avenue for appeal...Lt. Cooke has left the Air Force." It added that he did so "under conditions other than honorable." An "other than honorable" discharge is the most unfavorable label which can be assigned administratively.

Former SRS controller charged with bilking

TOPEKA — A former administrator in the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services was charged with 14 felony counts Monday for allegedly bilking the agency out of $14,000.

Frank Yeoman, assistant Shawnee County district attorney, said the charges were filed against Arthur Lewerenz of Topeka, who was the SRS controller before his dismissal in November. Lewerenz appeared in Shawnee County District Court, where his bond was set at $10,000.

Lewerenz was charged with five counts of making a false writing, four counts of felony theft, four counts of forgery and one count of making a false claim. The last charge carries a sentence of one to five years, while the others are punishable by one to three years in prison and a fine of up to $5,000.

Lewerenz allegedly converted $14,000 in SRS funds to his own use, and was dismissed Nov. 6 by Secretary Robert Harder. Authorities said a $14,187 cashier's check drawn on a Topeka bank and carrying Lewerenz's name was delivered to the home of an unidentified Kansas Bureau of Investigation agent the day after Lewerenz was fired.

Navy precision team pilot dies in crash

EL CENTRO, Calif. — A Navy Blue Angel jet crashed into the desert Monday while the team was practicing loops, killing the pilot, officials said. The accident came just a month after a similar accident killed four members of the Air Force's Thunderbirds.

The Navy identified the pilot as Lt. Cmdr. Stu Powrie, 34, of Pensacola, Fla. He was the 20th pilot of the precision flying team to be killed in air shows or training since the group was formed in 1946, the Navy said. Two enlisted men also have been killed.

The six team members, flying A-4 Skyhawks, were preparing for their first 1982 air show, scheduled for March 13 at Yuma, Ariz. A team spokesman said it was uncertain if the show would go on as planned.

Bill focuses on bankrupt grain elevators

TOPEKA — A bill designed to address problems of bankrupt grain elevators and warehouses was introduced Monday in the Kansas Senate.

It was one of seven proposals to be received during a brief session. They now will be forwarded to committees for hearings and consideration.

The grain warehousing measure requires a comprehensive financial audit of a firm or individual which applies for a state license to operate a grain elevator, and would impose a first-ever insurance requirement.

Currently elevators must have a bond covering part of the value of stored grain, but the Senate bill would force an elevator to have insurance covering at least 50 percent of the value of stored grain.

The measure is the Legislature's latest effort to provide farmers with added security that their grain is adequately protected if an elevators declares bankruptcy.

Committee endorses primary election bill

TOPEKA — Without debate and on an unrecorded voice vote, the Senate Elections Committee endorsed for passage Monday a bill which would make permanent Kansas' presidential primary election, first held in 1980.

The bill now goes to the full Senate for debate and a vote.

The committee also endorsed the bill, sponsored by Sen. Mike Johnston (D-Parsons) last year but it never came up for debate in the Senate and finally was sent back to the committee at the end of the 1981 session to keep it alive.

It has the strong backing of Gov. John Carlin and Secretary of State Jack Brier, although both believe procedural changes should be made in the primary — mainly when it is held in 1984. But they said those changes could be made by the Legislature next year.

Brier said it is important to let potential presidential contenders know this year whether Kansas is going to have its primary again, so they can include it on their campaign agenda.

Orchestra's fate felt nationwide

The music industry sees businesses fail and fall to the wayside day in and day out. Yet, a unique pain is felt throughout a community when one of its brightest cultural assets dissolves into a nonentity. Such is the reaction to the announcement concerning the loss of the Kansas City Philharmonic.

In effect it appears that the community itself is saying, "No thank you." But the rumors and the rumblings surrounding the Philharmonic's board of directors decision to cancel the remaining performances of the orchestras 49th winter season raises eyebrows, as well as fears, across the nation.

Is this a trend-setting example for other major city orchestras or just a combination of mismanagement plus nonsupport? The orchestra has lacked a musical director for 18 months and endowments are meager. When budgets are trimmed, unfortunately, aid to the cultural arts is the first area to be slashed or eliminated. Area businessmen and citizens apparently feel the Philharmonic is of no intrinsic value.

The quality which existed in the Philharmonic would take years to recreate. The talented musicians will move on to other jobs, abandon their field completely or join the growing line of unemployeed.

Could the Philharmonic have been saved? Contracts may have been shortened, a one-year layoff to rebuild finances could have been instituted or perhaps a continuation of efforts to raise money may have succeeded. Only educated guesses can be made now.

Meanwhile the remaining cultural arts of Kansas City, and those nationwide, will harbor a fear of facing a similar fate. Only continued and expanded patronage will erase the questions raised over the fate of the Philharmonic.

Tax support is lethal

Editor,

Two places of prominence in the eyes of the American public are about to change over the next few weeks. Here are some similarities and differences to consider as Poland slides from view and the media focuses on El Salvador.

Poland and El Salvador are both strong Catholic countries, dominated by military regimes and martial law. In both countries there is massive popular resentment and resistance to the regimes, and again, the presence and sympathy of the Catholic church is felt at every level of resistance. Both governments are able to suppress the natural political processes only through active military and economic support from a superpower whose only motive is to maintain political and economic control over that country's area and population. These characteristics are widely accepted, regardless of whether the source is biased toward the right or left.

The important difference lies in the level and severity of violence in each country and who is implicated by it. The situation has been terrible in El Salvador for more than three years with an annual political death rate of about 12,000. Poland has been under martial law since December and has an annual death rate of about 120 people. As a percentage of the national population, the political death rate in El Salvador is roughly one thousand times higher than Poland's.

Obviously these are oversimplifications, and in El Salvador both sides are doing some killing. However, regardless of the uniform, easily nine out of ten murders are done with arms that were originally given by your government to the Salvadoran army. Washington is gearing up to give more and more lethal armed "support" to the military.

You and I, as part of the U.S. government, must decide if we want to be involved in this violence or not. Every day you wait to decide thirty more people are dying, partially due to our tax money.

Gauging the pulse of February

It is written off as a kind of death time, a long night between seasons. It carries the debris of winter — the patches of decayed snow, the gullies of mud, the sprayed-up filth on fender and windshield — and it is touched on warmer days by delusions of spring. Yet it is neither the one season nor the other. Its identity is that it has no identity.

Memories do not attach to February. There is no winter-bundling of coziness, no ardor of April. The time passes empty, as discreetly as a wino who trudges by too sodden to panhandle.

In February even Aggieville seems tired. The students bombing out on 3.2 and space games appear locked in a ritual that is less adventure now than weary habit. The bands at Brother's are as loud as street crews breaking pavement, but their racket dins no life into February. At this time of year you'd probably be hard put to find even a decent fight with pool cues and longnecks. No one seems in love. There is no spring and never was a Christmas. God is dead.

WHY, THEN, do I relish this time?

Why is it the happiest stretch of pure drabness in the whole collegiate year?

Precisely because of its emptiness, its non-identity. It imposes no feelings, offers no distractions, inspires no nostalgia. Of all the months of the year, February leaves you most free to come to terms cooly with yourself.

To someone like me, back on a university campus after decades away, this is a welcome moment. A breather. All the other passages of the school year are charged with various electricities of joy or dread. Everything in those months seems to be either a party or a final exam, and the mood-swings and energies of 17,000-or-so students can generate enough voltage to knock you giddy.

IT'S PROBABLY WORST in the spring. How does one face up to the BIG questions (Am I teaching anybody anything? Is journalism really something I want people to go into?) when April turns an entire campus into an open convertible?

How does one cast a sternly appraising eye on the inner self when the smells of spring turf, the pastel exuberance all around, the wonders of sheer youngness, compete for attention?

It will be tempting in spring to feel half my age. (It happens every year, April after April — the same illusion produced by the same sleight-of-hand: Presto! You're a kid again!) And all the green, the morning rains, the music out of open windows, will put off the inevitable ache of discovering once again that this is nature's little Joke's-on-You.

But February...February doesn't play you false. The heart is temporarily dormant, the electricity switched to "Off."

Outside, the trees hang as dead as gibbets against a sky the color of wet newspapers. The morning weeps. I dwell on sober thoughts, ponder the state of my soul, and take the measure of my cold February pulse.

Ah, normal!

And it feels great.

Jesuit priest supports peace action

Daniel Berrigan, the Jesuit priest who served one-and-one- half years in prison for seizing draft board documents and destroying them, will speak at 7:30 tonight in Forum Hall of the K-State Union.

His speech entitled "The Peace Making Citizen and the War-Making State," is the second of the Lou Douglas lecture series sponsored by University For Man.

Berrigan believes his role as religious leader and peace activist are linked.

In 1968 he was among eight Roman Catholics who were arrested for entering a draft board in Catonsville, Md., and seizing 378 potential draftees' files. After using homemade napalm to burn the documents, the group dubbed the Catonsville Nine waited outside the draft board's offices and prayed until federal authorities arrested them.

His efforts to promote peace did not end after his incarceration. September 9, 1980, Berrigan and a group of eight people entered an electric plant housing nuclear weapons vehicles, and damaged the nosecones of two re-entry vehicles for nuclear weapons. The action was a symbolic gesture calling for the American public to beat swords into plowshares.

"He's a person who puts his faith on the line in living day by day," said Rev. Rod Saunders, campus minister for Ecumenical Christian Ministries. "He calls forth an incredible response to stand up, speak out and live against forces of evil and destruction that are against humanity."

To Father Dan Scheetz, chaplain at St. Isidore's Catholic Church, Berrigan is more than just a peace activist.

"He's a modern prophet. He stands at the piercing point of man's evolution of moral consciousness," Scheetz said. "I believe he has some insight into the present and foresight into the future."

Some of Berrigan's methods for promoting peace are questioned by Robert Linder. professor of history, who considers himself an activist also.

"I share his view that it's hard to change things peacefully," Linder said. "I've always been an activist, but that doesn't mean I'd go as far as civil disobedience."

"Berrigan feels like he's a prophet crying in the wilderness. He thinks it's much harder to change things now. He feels there's something wrong with the grass roots of America."

"The thing that bothers people most about him is that he is an activist for peace, not a passive activist, which irritates many Christians. He makes Christians aware of the issues involved in blurring God and country together," Linder said.

Warranty act strengthens buyers' rights, protection

Editor's note: Consumer Corner is a project of the Consumer Relations Practicum class.

By RENEE SCHRECKENGOST
Contributing Writer

As a consumer, you buy products for your own needs. This, at times, can be frustrating because many of the same products vary in price, features and even warranties. You need to know how to be an effective consumer.

The Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act (a federal warranty law) can help you. The major provision of this law states that products costing more than $15 must have their warranties available for inspection prior to their sale. This allows the consumer to comparison shop and get the best warranty. In addition, the act helps after you buy a product by making it easier to deal with companies who do not honor their warranty promises.

Before consumers can accurately judge a warranty, they must understand the "language" of warranties. In simple terms, a warranty (or guarantee) is a written statement by the manufacturer or seller about the quality or performance of their product with a promise to do something about it if it does not meet the stated standards.

There are two types of written warranties — full and limited. These types have been given special provisions under the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act so that all written warranties for products costing more than $10 must be labeled as either full or limited.

A FULL WARRANTY means that a defective product will be repaired or replaced within a reasonable amount of time without charge to the customer for parts or labor. Furthermore, the warrantor cannot impose unreasonable conditions on a consumer to get this service. If the product cannot be fixed, the customer must be offered a refund or replacement. A full warranty does not have to cover the whole product, it may cover only part of the product. Always check to see what parts of the product the warranty does cover.

Warranties that offer anything less than full warranties are designated as limited warranties. A limited warranty may cover only parts of the product and not labor or might mean replacement instead of a refund.

BE AWARE OF the fact that some products carry more than one written warranty. It may have a full warranty on part of the product and a limited warranty on the rest. When evaluating a written warranty, look for the following:

— Name and address of warrantor.

— To whom the warranty is extended (the original owner or all owners during the lifetime of the warranty).

— What exactly is and is not covered (parts, labor, etc.).

— Who stands behind the warranty.

— What the warrantor will do in the event of a defect, malfunction, or failure to conform with the written warranty.

— What your responsibilities are under the warranty.

The Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act does not require products to have a warranty. However, when a warranty exists, thanks to this law, your basic rights are clarified and specific rules have been established to make warranties more uniform. So, if a product is advertised as having a warranty, be sure to ask to see it — even if it means "ripping open the box to get to it."

Administrators address College Republicans

Freshmen may be allowed to park on campus

By CHRIS MOORE
Collegian Reporter

Freshmen may soon be able to park on campus instead of using city streets, according to Art Stone, director of Security and Traffic.

Stone was one of five University administrators who spoke at a Student Issues Forum sponsored by College Republicans Monday night. Other speakers were: Kathy Lungren, student attorney; Raydon Robel, director of Recreational Services; Dr. Robert Tout, director of Lafene Student Health Center; and Tom Frith, housing director.

"If everything goes as planned, freshmen will be able to park in campus parking lots by July 1st," Stone said.

One of the reasons the change was made, Stone said, was the parking ordinance enacted by the city which restricts parking east of campus.

"People that live in residence halls can't park east of campus and something needed to be done," he said.

ANOTHER REASON for the proposed change, Stone said, is current University policy creates problems for some students.

"We have many coming to school here from towns like Wamego and Chapman and they are then told they can't park on campus. We encourage them to come to school, but then restrict their parking. This change should solve some of the problem," he said.

The added number of freshmen cars parked on campus should not be a problem because the present parking facilities are not being "completely utilized," he said.

Stone also said he would like to improve the image of Security and Traffic.

"We are just enforcing the rules that were made. If people don't like them they can be changed," he said.

The claim that department image is a problem was echoed by Tout.

"I am trying to have a freer hand with physicians' salaries because it's difficult to get good doctors at the present salary level. Working in student health is not as lucrative as private practice," Tout said.

TOUT SAID has some trouble attracting needed medical personnel.

He emphasized that Lafene is able to handle most medical problems except medically life-threatening situations, in which case the student would be treated by a local hospital.

Tout said in another year parts of the center will be remodeled to allow for more space and privacy.

Another area of campus that will see remodeling is housing, according to Frith.

"We are trying to organize cash together to renovate Van Zile and are first going to do a test renovation of part of Jardine," he said.

Frith saw no immediate plans to build new residence halls because of cost and the "leveling off of enrollment."

LUNGREN SAID serving more students was her goal.

"I would like to be able to see more people, if possible. All I can do is give advice, but if needed I would refer a student to a private lawyer if they needed actual representation," she said.

Robel said Recreational Services is a adding a group of exercise machines northwest of the Rec Complex.

The machines will help physical fitness by including stretching exercises and jogging as part of the program, according to Robel.

Social services seek to increase campus visibility

By DEE ANNE HEADLEY
Collegian Reporter

Do you need legal advice, want to know some trivia, have landlord problems or need sexual counseling? These are just a few of the areas in which students can get information and help through campus social services.

For Social Services Awareness Week, which began Monday and ends Friday, the seven organizations comprising the social services have planned activities and programs to inform students about the learning opportunities and help available to them.

"The purpose of Social Services Awareness Week is to increase the visibility of the social services on campus," Margie Horton, director of social services, said.

The University Learning Network (ULN) is the information center on campus, said Michael Remus, ULN director and graduate in education.

"We answer any question from academics to trivia," he said. "When people call, they usually want the information right then and we try to give it to them."

THE ORGANIZATION has lists from which it can give students the names of typists, tutors and babysitters. It can also provide telephone numbers.

"Last semester, we had over 16,000 calls," Remus said. "We received about 200 questions a day, so we feel like we serve a lot of students."

The service is run by Remus, an assistant director, six work-study students and approximately 30 volunteers.

ULN, located in Holton 10, operates from 9 a.m. to 11 p.m. Monday through Friday, 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. Saturday and 4 to 8 p.m. on Sunday.

One of the main functions of the Women's Resource Center (WRC) is to provide resources on the changing roles of women in society, said Shelly Crosby, graduate assistant for women's programs and the resource center.

THE CENTER has books, files and other printed material that are available to students. WRC also refers students to other sources if it cannot help with a question or problem.

"We do programs on the changing status of women in society and we also sponsor special events," Crosby said.

She said about 150 people came in and used the center last semester.

The center's staff includes four paid positions and about 15 full- and part-time volunteers.

WRC is located in Holton 111 and is open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

University for Man (UFM), the free university on campus, provides students with an opportunity to learn without the pressures associated with regular classes, Julie Coates, director of campus community programs, said.

IN ADDITION to offering classes, UFM is service-oriented."

UFM has four part-time paid employees and the rest of the staff are volunteers.

Women extend streak, face Jayhawks tonight

The women's version of the K-State — Kansas basketball rivalry will continue tonight at Ahearn Field House.

K-State won its last contest, an 89-36 romp over Creighton Saturday night. The win was the 12th in a row for the Wildcats, 21-5 on the season.

Kansas, with a record of 15-13, lost to Minnesota 73-57 on Saturday. Tonight's battle will be the Jayhawks' third consecutive road game. Kansas was ranked as high as ninth in the nation earlier in the year.

K-State Head Coach Lynn Hickey said the key to stopping Kansas is controlling 6-foot center Tracy Claxton.

"They are a talented team that has some real incentives and motivation to come to K-State and perform well. We've got to keep Claxton out of the game," Hickey said.

Claxton has averaged 19 points per game and 14 rebounds for the Jayhawks this season while Priscilla Gary scores 18 a game for K-State.

Hickey also said the crowd could play an important role in the Wildcats' performance.

"We'd like to have a good crowd for the game because they could play a key role in giving us a real home court advantage," she said.

In an earlier meeting between the two teams in Lawrence, K-State came away with an 83-74 victory. Tammie Romstad was the leading scorer with 22 points while Gary added 19. Claxton popped in a game-high 23 for Kansas and Chris Stewart threw in 16. The 'Cats shot 56 percent while the Jayhawks hit 39 percent of their shots.

Last season, the Jayhawks swept the three meetings between the intrastate rivals. The closest score of the three games was 74-63.

After the game tonight, the 'Cats will begin preparing for Saturday's game at Wichita State.

Manhattan native chosen women's softball coach

Ralph Currie, 58, has been named the women's softball coach for the upcoming season. Currie steps into the position formerly held by Charlotte Michal who resigned last November.

Currie, a native of Manhattan, said he is looking forward to coaching softball at K-State.

"I'm just tickled to death. When this opportunity came up, I couldn't refuse. I think everything is going to work out fine. There is no reason we can't win a majority of our games," Currie said.

Currie said he has played and coached softball since 1939. In 1964, Currie led a Manhattan-based team to a state championship. Currently, Currie is also the northeast commissioner for the Kansas Amateur Softball Association.

Dream team selected

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — The best player in the Big Eight this year? It's Ricky Frazier, or Steve Stipanovich, or Jack Moore, or Tim Jankovich...

Or, as Oklahoma Coach Billy Tubbs declared, "The whole Missouri team."

Conference head coaches were asked Monday whom they would pick first from the Big Eight, excluding their own players, if they were starting a basketball team. Their answers varied quite a bit, reflecting a widely held opinion that the Big Eight, from top to bottom, is exceptionally balanced this season.

Frazier, Missouri's do-everything senior forward, was the most prominently mentioned. Stipanovich, the Tigers' 6-foot-11 center, also drew lots of attention.

"It's a difficult question because I don't think there is one dominant player in the conference," said Tom Apke of Colorado. He said Moore, Nebraska's 5-foot-9 senior guard, "is the most dominant small guard I've ever seen.

"David Little and Chuck Barnett at Oklahoma have had super seasons, and Leroy Coombs of Oklahoma State is the kind of player we could use. Missouri has several MVPs. They can't win without Moon McCrary, and they can't win without (guard) Jon Sundvold.

"But if you had to pick one guy, I'd say Stipanovich. The big player is the thing that would make it easier to build a team around. There's balance in this league."

Jack Hartman of Kansas State had difficulty selecting a single player.

"Players who have competed hard and played well against us come to mind," he said. "Frazier, (Kansas forward David) Magley, Coombs, Little, Barnett."

"I think Ricky Frazier has had the best year of anyone in the conference," said Kansas Coach Ted Owens.

"Three come to mind," Paul Hansen of Oklahoma State said."One, although he's not played that good, is Stipanovich. Also Frazier, or Jack Moore and Jon Sundvold. Any one of those four are a tremendous asset to your club. But we're sort of programmed to take the big guy."

Missouri Coach Norm Stewart, not allowed to pick from his own conference championship squad, was at a bit of a loss.

"I think anybody would want to start a club with a big player, or an outstanding, complete player, or a good leader," he said.

"Starting with a big player first, in our league, it comes back to my player, Stipanovich. If I were starting with a guard, it would be Tim Jankovich (of Kansas State) or Jack Moore. They are certainly outstanding at running their clubs."

"I'd pick Stipanovich first," said Tubbs. "And I'd have to take Sundvold at guard. Well, I'll just pick Missouri's team. That'll be enough."

"I guess Stipanovich, if you're talking about centers," said Nebraska's Moe Iba. "Frazier's a good forward, and Kansas State's Ed Nealy."

K-State loses Top 20 rank

Virginia, which has won its last four games by a total of just 14 points, continued to be the overwhelming choice for the No.1 position in The Associated Press college basketball poll Monday.

Kansas State, surprised by Oklahoma State, and Indiana, downed by Purdue, both fell from the Top 20.

Preseason favorite North Carolina and DePaul were again second and third in the voting, while Oregon State and Missouri swapped the No. 4 and 5 slots, respectively.

West Virginia, currently riding the nation's longest winning streak at 22, and Kentucky both jumped three positions and took over sixth and seventh places.

Tulsa, Idaho and Memphis State rounded out the Top 10 in that order.

Ag conclave: Regional college students hear predictions, suggestions, challenges of agriculture leaders

By KAY HUNTER
Collegian Reporter

The No. 1 policy issue in agriculture today is who's going to make the production and policy decisions by the year 2000, according to Barry Flinchbaugh, associate professor of economics.

Flinchbaugh spoke Friday at the Agriculture Conclave on agricultural insight and speculated on what agriculture in the year 2000 would be like.

Forty-four ag council members and advisers from nine universities and two community colleges attended the conclave held Friday and Saturday, according to Carol Sobba and Becky Vining, seniors in agricultral journalism and coordinators of the event.

"We're either going to have, in the year 2000, an agriculture (economy) controlled by family corporations working through farm organizations, one farm organization buying and selling cooperatively, or we're going to have agriculture controlled by a few food producing and processing firms," Flinchbaugh said.

THE SOLUTION TO the question of who will make the production and marketing decision is political, Flinchbaugh said.

Farmers will have to be able to be involved politically as well as farm, he said, or they will have to employ people who have the time and knowledge to work politically.

There has been a turnover in agriculture politically, according to Flinchbaugh.

"We've become a minority group, but we continue to practice politics as if we were in the majority," he said.

"The key to effective agricultural politics in the '80s and '90s is to learn to practice politics of the potent minority. Potent because we produce something that the force out there needs — food," he said.

During another session Friday, Jeff Stafford, assistant director of housing, told the group some tricks of the trade for time management.

"Don't worry about speed, but worry about the quality of your work," he said.

Quality is more important than quantity in almost any job, profession or school, according to Stafford.

"Don't be a time nut trying to schedule every minute and worrying about being late," he said.

"I don't even wear a watch anymore," Stafford said. "I'm just as late sometimes, but at least I don't worry about it, so it's a lot less stress on me."

STAFFORD ALSO URGED the group to try to achieve some balance in their lives.

"Get some recreation, go to a movie, go to the Rec Complex, go play football...Do those things so you can be a whole person. You don't want to be just a student, or in the ag program," he said.

"Time management is making the correct choices. Time is your most valuable commodity. It's the one thing you have that's really yours," Stafford said.

Harland Priddle, secretary of the State Board of Agriculture, was the featured speaker at the Friday night banquet.

He defined the Board of Agriculture as being made up of 12 people in Kansas, two of which are elected from six different districts throughout the state.

"These people come from farms and farm organization. They're of grass roots constituency," he said.

There are nine divisions in the Board of Agriculture in which 305 people are employed, according to Priddle.

The nine divisions are Weights and Measures, Dairy, Crop Reporting, Entomology, Noxious Weeds and Pesticides, Control Division, Meat and Poultry Inspection, Water Resources and Marketing, he said while illustrating with slides.

PRIDDLE POSED several challenges to the group.

"I challenge you to be involved, be aggressive and be positive," he said. "Leadership is what it's all about."

The highlight of the conclave for Sobba was the goal setting session on Saturday morning, she said. In the session, councils met in their own groups to discuss their strengths and weaknesses, finding something specific to do now to improve.

"A lot of times ag councils will have a vague concept of what they want to improve, but we keep progressing as the year goes on from one action to another," Sobba said.

Universities represented included: Colorado State, South Dakota State, University of Nebraska, Oklahoma State, University of Missouri, Iowa State and the University of Illinois, Vining said.

ADVISERS ATTENDED from Johnson and Cloud County community colleges, she added.

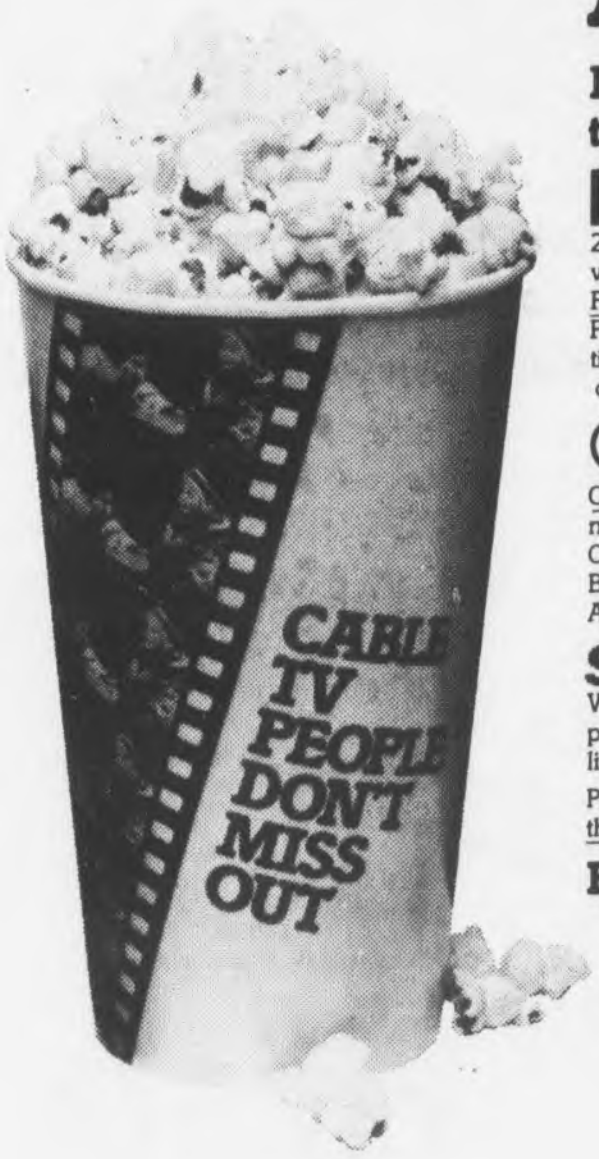
Ten K-State ag council members participated, according to Sobba.

She said she believed the session helped to make an ag council more effective.

Larry Svehla, junior in agricultural economics at the University of Nebraska, said he thought the conclave was very well organized.

"The speakers were outstanding and had personality. They addressed university topics and that's what I wanted to know. It's one of the best programs I've ever been to," he said.

Dan Gilbert, junior in dairy science at Iowa State University, said he had gotten several concrete ideas from the conclave to take home.



"We've got to encourage more people to come from our university next year so we'll have a bigger delegation," he added.

Students live, study as firefighters

Power plant houses working men

By KAREN BUSSERT
Collegian Reporter

The fire engine may be outdated and the equipment may not be the newest on the market, but student firefighters do a good job of handling "potentially dangerous" situations on campus, according to Frank Duncan, University fire chief.

Currently, eight students are working for the University Fire Department. The men live on the third floor of the Power Plant. Their quarters consist of four rooms, with two men to each room; a living room where blackboard training sessions are held, a kitchen and bathroom. Also located in the Power Plant is all the fire-fighting equipment.

Having the equipment and the firefighters in one place enables the students to respond immediately to any alarm, Duncan said.

The eight students rotate shifts between 5 p.m. and 8 a.m. Power Plant employees and any of the firefighters who can be located respond to fire alarms between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m. During the evening there are four men to each shift, a captain, driver and two hosemen.

ACCORDING TO DUNCAN, the firefighters have a responsibility to the campus.

"If we go out and do our job right, we take a potentially dangerous situation and defuse it," Duncan said. "Every run has the potential to be a disaster. How we handle it makes every difference in the world."

Mike Bodelson, fifth-year student in architecture and captain of B-shift, agrees with Duncan.

"I see our function as keeping a handle on situations that may become dangerous," Bodelson said. "In the long run we're an insurance policy. We're either going to make the difference (in handling the situations) or we're not."

According to Duncan, students misinterpret the seriousness of a response made by the fire department.

"Students seem to think that unless there is a fire showing, or lots of smoke, or an explosion then it really isn't that big of a deal," Duncan said. "But if we don't respond quickly and the men don't do the job they are trained to do, then oftentimes the smallest incident may become major."

'If we go out and do our job right, we take a potentially dangerous situation and defuse it.'

THE FIREFIGHTERS receive training in rescue, fire containment and fire fighting. Duncan does the majority of the training himself, although in the past, students have attended state-wide seminars on fire fighting. Each week they are required to attend a four-hour training session where they study building plans and have the chance to act out how they would react in different situations.

Each firefighter is responsible for keeping up to date on the buildings on campus. This includes the floor plans, warning systems and location of each building. They must also be aware of the fire hydrants in the vicinity of each building so they respond more quickly in case of an emergency, Duncan said.

The "paper" drills are very important, according to Richard Luck, captain of A-shift and senior in architectural engineering. He has been with the department for four years.

"The more we know about a structure before we respond to a situation, the better," Luck said. "We may go over three or four different fires on the blackboard so that each of us has an idea of how to handle many different situations."

IN ADDITION TO fire-fighting training the men are also trained in minor first aid and cardiopulmonary resuscitation.

One member of the crew, Doug Berwick, sophomore in construction science, also has his emergency medical technician (EMT) certification. This means that if a serious injury does occur, Berwick has the training needed to maintain the victim until an ambulance arrives.

The University Fire Department, which is funded through the University Facilities budget, responded to 115 calls last year. According to Duncan, this was the largest number of responses recorded since the program began in 1975. The University department has jurisdiction on campus, but the Manhattan Fire Department will usually send an engine and five men.

"Last year they (Manhattan Fire Department) responded to approximately one out of every four runs the University Fire Department made," Duncan said.

THE FIREFIGHTERS like the job because it gives them a chance to earn money to help offset college expenses.

"This is the kind of job that I can get something out of while I'm earning money," Luck said. "It isn't like pushing a broom somewhere. I really enjoy it. We all live up here and there is always plenty of time to study or watch TV between classes, training sessions and alarms."

According to Luck, who is the only married firefighter, being married and working as a firefighter is no problem.

"I'm married, and my wife likes it OK because I have enough time to get other things done, when a regular job wouldn't allow me that freedom," Luck said. "One of the other guys will take over for me so I can spend as much time with her as possible. It works."

The one drawback to the job, according to Bodelson, is that the men do not get time off for holidays and vacations. The department is in operation 24 hours a day, 12 months a year.

"It really isn't that bad," Bodelson said. "We have to regulate our weekends because we only get one weekend off a month."

"When most students go home for Christmas or spring break, we will probably be here on duty. Lots of holidays we take turns working double shifts so we can get home at least a day or two," Bodelson said.

ACCORDING TO LUCK, confidence is a major part of the job.

"For the first couple of months you're just kinda saying 'What do I do?, but then after about six months on the job you get more comfortable with your ability," Luck said. "It takes awhile for your body to adjust to the adrenalin that flows every time you hear that alarm. Sometimes you can actually move too fast, and that causes you to overlook things; you don't really make mistakes, but you'll think back and remember there was something you didn't do."

'It takes a while for your body to adjust to the adrenalin that flows every time you hear that alarm.'

Bodelson emphasized the importance of working as a team.

"The captain makes the decision, but everyone needs to be comfortable with what they do," Bodelson said. "This way the guys can anticipate what the captain is going to do and be able to execute those orders faster."

Duncan believes the biggest downfall of the department is the fire truck.

"We're limited in that we can't afford a new fire truck," Duncan said. "A 1947 Ford fire engine just can't hold as much equipment as I would like, but the important thing is that it gets us to the fires."

Conclave

members who attended from Iowa State.

Alan Baquet, adviser from Oklahoma State University, said he thought the program was designed well.

"There are some super resource people here at K-State. The interaction with other ag council members has been helpful in how we deal with our problems. People here in charge deserve credit in making the program tremendously successful," he said.

"We were pleased with the cooperation of other students and faculty and their input into the conclave," Sobba said.

She and Vining said they believe K-State's variety of speakers and having Priddle deliver the featured address were the keys to success in hosting the Agricultural Conclave.

"We have some of the most dynamic talents here at K-State and in the state of Kansas. We feel we were able to present a program that was impressive and useful at the same time," Sobba said.

The theme for this year's conclave was "strengthen the member, build the team," Sobba and Vining said.

"Before you can have a strong working team, you must build the individual," Sobba explained.

"We were thinking of basketball when we came up with the theme," Vining said.

The four Friday afternoon sessions, in which K-State faculty members spoke, were designed to develop the individual, according to Sobba.

K-State has a tradition of being a friendly university and the visitors felt like they were well hosted, she added.

"I have used certain words I'm sure most black people use to each other," he said. "It starts with 'n.' It isn't derogatory.

Williams' 14-year-old German shepherd dog, Sheba, was brought into the courtroom to dispute the testimony of a prosecution witness who said she saw Williams and Cater together with a dog frolicking nearby. The defense contends Williams' dog couldn't have been frolicking because of her age.

Williams, with his hands clasped and his thumbs pointing up, testified that before his arrest he had planned to set up a program last summer to teach children about the music business, "rather than have them on the streets with all this killing going on."

HE DENIED knowing karate. Prosecutors have suggested some of the victims may have been slain by a method that didn't give them a chance to fight back.

Binder asked Williams to stand in front of the jury, holding out his hands. He asked jurors to touch Williams' hands to see if they were calloused from karate, but not all of the jurors complied.

Earlier in the day, Williams' mother, Faye, took the stand.

Mrs. Williams had told jurors that her son was not a homosexual and said that "deep down in my heart" she does not believe anyone like him is responsible for the slayings.

Mrs. Williams, who has been battling cancer since 1980, also said she spoke to the mysterious Cheryl Johnson, the woman for whom Williams claimed to be searching the night he first came to police attention. Prosecutors claim the woman didn't exist.

THE DEFENDANT'S mother, who testified as the trial enetered its ninth week, said her only child had never been in a fistfight and was not a homosexual. Prosecutors contend Williams has a violent temper and that sexual preference may have played a role in the slayings.

"Forgive me, but I need to ask you this question," defense lawyer Alvin Binder told Williams. "Has your son ever acted like a sissy in front of you?"

"Good God, no," she replied.

Williams, a 64-year-old retired teacher who was 41 when her son was born, called him "our miracle child" and a "100 percent all-American boy."

She said she had never seen or heard of any of the 28 slaying victims.

Earlier Monday, Superior Court Judge Clarence Cooper barred defense lawyers from introducing testimony about a man the attorneys described as a former suspect in the slayings.

Slattery

problems would be to reduce the enormous deficits. "The government will record the largest deficit in our nation's history this year," Slattery said. He said this fact would "fuel the fires of inflation" and could raise interest rates to record levels.

ANOTHER STEP would be to encourage capital formation, which means money would be made available to borrowers, he said. As an example supporting his view, Slattery said America has the lowest savings rate of any industrial country of the free world.

Addressing national defense, Slattery said, "I do not trust the Soviet Union." The United States should be as relentless in the pursuit of peace as it is responsible in preparing for war, he said. "I shall never neglect my responsibility...to assure that the federal government meets its No. 1 responsibility, to provide for the nation's defense."

Slattery said he has no illusions about the campaign.

"I know it is extremely difficult to defeat an incumbent and 90 percent of incumbents who seek re-election are re-elected," he said, referring to Jeffries. "I will face an incumbent who has enormous family wealth and will have the ability to spend twice as much money as I can raise."

Yet Slattery said he believes the people of northeast Kansas want a change.

teachers," Coates said. "We go out and recruit people. We call them up, explain our program and ask them to teach for us. Most people are willing to share their skills."

The UFM office, at 1221 Thurston, is open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Kathy Lungren, students' attorney, also provides a service to students. "Any student who has a legal problem or question is welcome," she said.

"My services are strictly of an advisory and counseling capacity," Lungren said. "I don't go to court unless the case would affect all students. In that respect, I act differently than other attorneys."

ABOUT FIFTY students per week consult with Lungren. She can help with landlord and consumer problems and can also help students draw up simple documents, such as wills or contracts.

Lungren's office is in the Student Government Services office in the basement of the Union. Her office hours are 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday through Friday. She also accepts students without an appointment.

The Consumer Relations Board (CRB) acts as a liaison between consumers and businessmen, said Pam Kohman, CRB director and junior in business management.

"We try to help students help themselves first," Kohman said. "We give them advice on how they might solve a problem, then if they can't solve it, we step in."

Kohman said the board handles problems in areas such as landlords, mail-order businesses, auto repairs, contracts and subleases.

CRB HANDLES 150-200 calls per semester, Kohman said.

Kohman is the only paid staff person on the board. The other 12 positions are filled by students in the Consumer Relations Practicum course, offered in the Department of Family Economics.

The CRB office is open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Another service available to students is the FONE Crisis Center.

"The FONE Crisis Center acts like a funnel," said Katharine Andre, the center's director and junior in pre-veterinary medicine. "It takes a lot of different problems and refers them to places that do long-term counseling. We're there to listen to them and to get them through the night. We stay open when other agencies are closed."

The office at 1221 Thurston is open from 5 p.m. to 8:30 a.m. each day.

FONE and ULN also sponsor DIAL, a phone-in tape service which students can call to request to hear a tape on a certain subject.

FONE is operated by three paid staff members and 65 volunteers, Andre said.

All of the social services, except the student attorney, will have tables set up in the Union today and Wednesday to distribute information about their services.

Williams claims witnesses 'outright lied'

ATLANTA (AP) — Wayne B. Williams angrily turned back attempts by prosecutors to shake his story Tuesday, lashing out at his accusers and declaring: "I'm innocent, and that's all there is to it."

"Did you experience any panic at any point during the time you were killing these victims?" Assistant District Attorney Jack Mallard asked the 23-year-old murder defendant at one point during the afternoon cross-examination.

"Sir, I haven't killed anyone," Williams replied.

"Isn't it true you killed them?" Mallard asked.

"I'm about as guilty as you are," Williams told him. "If you're guilty, then I'm guilty."

At one point Williams said he could have been a victim himself in the string of slayings of 28 young Atlanta blacks that outraged the nation.

"I'm 23 years old and I could have been a victim ... Anyone in Atlanta could have been. I'm not so sure it's over yet," he said.

Williams also said that policemen threatened him, that eyewitnesses made up stories and that he feared for his life after being questioned last spring in the series of slayings.

"I haven't done anything. I'm innocent, and that's all there is to it," Williams insisted.

Jurors furiously scribbled notes as Williams, who was dressed in a dark three-piece suit with no tie, testified for more than four hours Tuesday, his second day on the stand. Cross-examination is to continue Wednesday.

Williams, a black free-lance cameraman and self-styled talent promoter, has pleaded innocent to murdering Nathaniel Cater, 27, and Jimmy Ray Payne, 21, two of 28 young blacks whose deaths over a 22-month period have been investigated by a special police task force. No arrests have been made in the other cases.

Williams testified Monday that he never met Cater or Payne and did not kill them or the 10 other young blacks prosecutors contend were linked in a pattern of slayings.

Mallard asked the defendant if he thought all the witnesses who testified against him were liars, and Williams replied: "Some lied, some told half-truths, some were mistaken, and some outright lied."

Williams denied prosecutors' contention that he dropped Cater's body off a Chattahoochee River bridge just before he was stopped by a police stakeout team in the early morning hours of May 22, 1981.

"I did not throw anything off that bridge," he said.

The defendant traced his activities in the hours after midnight May 22, closely following his parents' testimony in all respects but one. Williams said he went out between 1 and 1:30 a.m., while both parents testified he went out around midnight.

Williams said he went to the area of the Jackson Parkway bridge to search for the address of a singer he was to meet the next morning.

Asked why he didn't stop at a service station to ask directions, Williams replied, "Me being in Cobb County at 3

Student numbers hit record high spring semester

A record number of students enrolled for spring semester classes, University officials announced Monday.

According to 20th-day enrollment totals, which are the official reporting figures for all Kansas Regents' universities, a headcount total of 18,654 students are currently enrolled. That represents an increase of 320 students from the number enrolled during the 1981 spring semester, besides being a new spring semester enrollment record.

The record total includes 16,928 on-campus students (up 374 from a year ago) and 1,727 off-campus headcount enrollment (down 54 for the same term in 1981).

Full-time equivalent (FTE) totals show a slight decline. Current total FTE enrollment is 17,099, compared to 17,122 a year ago. The on-campus FTE is 16,636 (up 179) while the off-campus FTE total is 463 (down 202 from last year).

FTE enrollments are calculated by dividing total undergraduate credit hours by 15, veterinary medicine (pre-professional) credit hours by 12 and graduate credits by nine.

Both the University of Kansas and Wichita State University also showed increases in spring semester enrollment numbers. KU officials reported a headcount number of 23,035 students currently enrolled, up 37 from the same term in 1981. WSU officials announced 108 more students enrolled this than at this time last year, raising the total headcount to 15,897.

Emporia State University spring semester enrollment showed a decrease in the number of students, which, according to ESU's Office of Admissions, is characteristic of enrollment over the last few years. According to the admissions office at ESU, this trend is due to the redistricting of the off-campus continuing education program from ESU to KU. There are currently 5,553 students enrolled at ESU.

Bruce to leave University Relations to fill similar position in Nebraska

A "good opportunity professionally" has led Bob Bruce to resign his position as director of University Relations and move to a similar position at the University of Nebraska, Lincoln.

"Nebraska has one university as opposed to two major universities, more national visibility than K-State and I view it as a professional advancement," Bruce said.

He submitted his resignation to President Duane Acker on Friday and was appointed as the director of University Information by the Nebraska Board of Regents at Lincoln Saturday. He will begin his new job on April 1.

"We regret seeing him leave and wish him well in his new job," Acker said.

Thoughts of leaving K-State began when several people from Nebraska urged Bruce to apply for the position, he said.

Bruce came to K-State as director of the Office of Information in 1978. During this time here, the name of the office was changed to University Relations and he was charged with the additional task of managing printing services.

Currently, he manages the printing and photography services, University publications and University news. His job at Nebraska will be the same with the exclusion of the printing services responsibility.

The university information office is a new organization for Nebraska. It will consolidate various publications, photography and news services.

"I think highly of the University of Nebraska," Bruce said. "It is a good academic institution and has a national reputation in a lot of fields....I was attracted by what I thought was a good career move for me."

Leaving was a decision Bruce said he has mixed feelings about but the "challenge involved" makes the move worthwhile.

"Any time a person makes a move like this, it is difficult. The public information people (at K-State) are tremendous, a terrific staff," Bruce said. "People don't know how good they are and how many things we do. Leaving those people is difficult."

A replacement for Bruce has not been announced, but he has submitted his opinion of who should be acting director to Acker. Bruce declined to reveal the name.

Corrections

The Sexuality Education and Counseling Service was mistakenly omitted from Tuesday's article on Social Services Awareness Week.

Leigh Liggett, director and graduate student in marriage and family counseling, said one of the main functions of the service is to provide counseling. Students can get information and counseling on issues such as birth control, pregnancy, sexual and dating relationships and many other aspects of sexuality.

Conseling is done by appointment, on a walk-in basis or over the telephone, Liggett said. She is in her office in Holton 103 on Monday, Tuesday and Thursday afternoons.

The service also has a library available to students containing material dealing with sexuality.

Students of the peer sex education class are volunteers who present films and programs to living groups and classes for the service.

It was also incorrectly reported in the Feb. 18 issue of the Collegian that the list that people were signing in the Union at the table set up by John Markiewicz was a petition. According to Markiewicz, it was not a petition. Also incorrect was the statement in the Feb. 18 issue that the table was being set up to pay for the original advertisement in the Collegian. This was corrected in the article in the Feb. 19 issue.

Newspaper, broadcast group founder dies

TOPEKA — Oscar S. Stauffer, founder of the newspaper and broadcast group that bears his name and a moving force behind Alf Landon's bid for the presidency in 1936, died Tuesday in Scottsdale, Ariz., his family announced. He was 95.

Stauffer began his newspaper career in 1906 as a $6-a-week cub reporter under the legendary William Allen White of the Emporia Gazette.

Stauffer was hospitalized Jan. 19, after he suffered what was described as a mild stroke. He appeared to be recovering but doctors said he had a more severe attack on Jan. 25.

He lived in Scottsdale from November to April each year, the rest of the time in Topeka, headquarters for Stauffer Communications Inc.

He liked to recount that his job with William Allen White was the only one from which he was ever fired.

White let him go after two years, forcing the young Stauffer to attend the University of Kansas.

"I didn't think of it that way at the time, but it was the best thing he could have done for me," Stauffer said years later.

Crime school teaches fine art of theft, fraud

HACKENSACK, N.J. — Police here and in New York City are investigating reports of what appears to be a school for crime that coaches prospective thieves on how to use stolen credit cards.

One of three people arrested at a department store here on Friday was found to have a notebook containing what appeared to be class notes, including 10 pages on such topics as the easiest stores to hit, what to wear, and telephone numbers to find out lines of credit on stolen credit cards, police said.

One of the suspects, Linda Johnson, told police she paid $100 to enroll in a two-day course, but refused to tell the location of the school.

Paramus police said the school apparently gives students a kit including counterfeit or stolen credit cards from all major companies, a list of approved fences, and forged identification papers.

"It's a hell of a scam," Police Chief Joseph Delaney said Monday.

Joseph Nichols, a security officer for First Jersey Bank, said he believes graduates are responsible for up to $60,000 in illegal purchases made since November with cards issued by his bank.

Portland boy dies after prolonged coma

PORTLAND, Ore. — A 9-year-old boy has died at Providence Hospital Child Center after spending more than half his life in a coma.

Danny Scanlon of Portland, went into a coma in 1976 after nearly drowning during an Arizona vacation. The boy weighed only 23 pounds when he died Sunday.

"I always knew he was going to die, but I always kept hoping he would get better," said the boy's father, Daniel Scanlon. "I never gave up hope."

Scanlon and his wife, Debora, kept the boy at home with thme the first year after the accident, but he was transferred to Providence in November 1977.

Teacher flips for pancake contest, doesn't flop

LIBERAL — A grade school gym teacher flipped her pancake for the third time and sprinted across the finish line in Liberal Tuesday for victory in the International Pancake Race.

Barbara McCaffrey led a field of a dozen skillet-carrying Liberal women across the finish line by almost 50 feet. Her time — 65.3 seconds — edged Rosemary Ludgate, who won the Olney, England, leg of the international race, by two-tenths of a second earlier in the day.

"I was running with the pack back down the block, but I was able to find the strength for that final sprint and I think that did it," McCaffrey said after finishing the 415-yard zig-zag course through streets lined with observers.

"I keep in shape by working with all these school children. We do a lot of sprints in our classes," she said.

Contestants are required to flip the pancake in their skillets at the start of the race, midway through the course and at the end.

Communists continue fighting in Thailand

BANGKOK, Thailand — Fourteen government soldiers were killed and 50 wounded in a five-day assault on a mountain stronghold of Communist Party forces in southern Thailand, a military spokesman said Tuesday.

Government forces have seized one camp in an area that harbors about 300 insurgents of the outlawed Communist Party of Thailand, and fighting is continuing in Surat Thani and Nakhon Si Thammarat provinces, said the spokesman of the Internal Security Operations Command.

About 800 government troops backed by artillery and air strikes are involved, he said. So far the bodies of three rebels have been found, he added.

General's report requires change

The agenda of events this Monday included the surgeon general's annual report on smoking and health. The report included the expected annual conclusions that smoking is a health hazard, a message destined to find its place in the archives of history.

The report's language grows stronger each year and the non-smoking public's reaction grows louder. Few spout social working calls for cold turkey redemption of all smokers. Instead, concern increases over the potential health hazard to non-smokers evident in public smoking.

Surgeon General C. Everett Koop's report contains two reports that conclude that non-smoking wives of smoking husbands suffer an increased risk of lung cancer, as reported by the Associated Press. Assistant secretary for health, Edward N. Brandt agreed with Koop's assessment that a the suspected hazard to non-smokers is real.

The act of smoking and the tobacco industry are social and economic needs to a large segment of America's population. Both have influential forces backing their existence and seeking their continued proliferation.

However, the facts presented in past surgeon general reports have convinced many smokers to quit and those highlighted by Koop should do the same: Cancer was responsible for 412,000 U.S. deaths in 1980. Cigarette smoking accounts for approximately thirty percent of all cancer deaths and, if not for cigarette smoking, the overall cancer rate in the U.S would have declined because of better diagnosis and treatment.

If Americans continue to choose to smoke the right is, and should be, theirs alone. But as the reports and studies indicate that a "public health potential hazard" should be recognized by non-smokers, then smokers need to undergo a form of resocialization.

The question of what is public and what is not public smoking will arise and the answer should not be presented in a campaign for community funds to be spent on cleverly designed non-smoking signs that draw border lines in and between the public.

Instead, smokers should just not smoke among non-smokers without aquiring permission from all present. When ashtrays are not present the message is evident. If permission is assumed, no rebuttals should arise to requests by others not to smoke. Non-smokers should never hesitate to exercise their right to lower personal potential health hazards, an easy and significantly cheaper solution.

Beware the Jabberwocky patrol

Everywhere I go people are making useless noise. I find it distracting.

A nap in the Cat's Pause lounge is disturbed by two girls talking about their lunch at Bocker's II. It's not that I have anything against pseudo-studying but the accompanying play by play is just not necessary. Out of an entire University, why must people choose a supposedly quiet place to gab?

It seems to me that it's time we did something. There has to be an organization somewhere on campus that is sitting around thinking, "Gosh, I wish there was something meaningful which we could do for the University!" Enter the Silencers.

These brave young men and women could be located in an office somewhere waiting to take an urgent phone call. "Students running a crap game. Second floor hallway, Eisenhower. Code 2."

Hundreds of unnecessary sounds fill the everyday quiet. People across campus are getting headaches and slowly going deaf. Some of the daily sounds are necessary but we ought to think about lowering the volume a little. I have found nothing in the Constitution that says a person's free speech can't be exercised at a normal tone. Why all this yelling and screaming?

Perhaps the Silencers will seek answers to these questions. And they would be out there every day, on the sidewalks of the campus with their arm bands, walkie talkies and blue hats in place, their little ticket books ready to go. Why not purchase a device similar to Security and Traffic's wheel clamps and fix people's mouths shut? Upon payment of a $20 fine, or swearing on the seal of the great state of Kansas to be quiet, their mouths would be re-opened.

It is possible that some students might abuse this service by calling a Silencer into what they consider to be a mundane lecture. This could be embarassing. To prevent this, a system of tenure would be worked out. The more articles published by the professor the less chance a Silencer would be sent into his classroom. Of course, there are graduate teaching assistants to consider.

I have the feeling that every GTA needs to silence at least one student during the semester.

You've all sat behind the guy or gal who always asks lengthy irrelevant questions or maybe you've found yourself rambling on in class with nothing to say so you keep talking because none of your fellow students has the guts to yell out from boredom, "Hey, will you shut up!"

The Silencers could benefit all of Manhattan. I'd like someone to find out why the Fire Department blows its fire house siren for a good 45 seconds at three in the morning but they only let it rip for 15 seconds at three in the afternoon. Perhaps it's my fault for living too close to Aggieville.

Who wants to ask my neighbor to rev his car up after he gets to work, not at 6:30 in the morning? Does anyone want to put a stray cat in my neighborhood out of our misery?

The responsibility for quietude should be in the hands of trained professionals instead of us rank amateurs. All it would take is a note taped to the door asking that his girlfriend hang up the phone after 35 rings. No one considers that there are people within earshot of the phone.

A Silencer majoring in biology could ask the birds if they'd like to sing outside someone else's window tomorrow morning. Someone in Military Science might drive out to Fort Riley and suggest that they play war during the day. We deserve to know if banging radiator pipes are more or less of a barrier to learning than a noisy lawnmower. (There's a grant in here somewhere!)

Of course my own roommates might call the Silencers when I play David Bromberg every Saturday at 9 a.m. And they might be secretly complaining about the hum of my aquarium pump. I have no way of knowing.

But if we had Silencers, I am sure we could all rest a little easier. Well maybe not easier, quieter anyway.

Eastman Kodak grants funding to University

K-State has received a Kodak educational grant for $1,700 through Eastman Kodak Company's 1981 Educational Aid Program.

The Kodak award, part of a $4.7 million program which assists 166 academic institutions and 34 educational organizations throughout the United States, recognizes contributions to Kodak's business success made by graduates from institutions of higher learning.

The grant dollars will support Kodak undergraduate scholarships and fund designated projects. Funding for the grant is provided from the company's current earnings and from funds set aside for this purpose.

The K-State grant is administered through Texas Eastman Company, a division of Eastman Kodak Company.

Association plans to award 'incentive' grant

The Manhattan Branch of the American Association of University Women (AAUW) plans for the second year in a row to award a $700 "incentive" grant to a student. In addition, a second $500 grant is planned. The awards will be for the 1982-83 academic year. The AAUW has provided continued support of an undergraduate scholarship at K-State.

The awards will go to "aid mature women students returning after a lapse of five or more years to complete undergraduate studies to do graduate work."

Applications must be submitted by April 1. Recipients will be announced at the Manhattan AAUW's May meeting.

Student win cash for work with aluminum

Winners in the annual Reynolds Aluminum Prize for Architectural Students competition are Ed Kurtz, junior in architecture and Alan Rogers, junior in architecture.

The students will share $300 in prize money for their designs "which creatively employ the special properties of aluminum," according to Eugene Kremer, architecture department head.

Rogers, whose solution will be sent to Washington, D.C., as the University's entry in national competition administered by the American Institute of Architects, was a student of J.C. Heintzelman, professor of architecture. Kurtz worked with Rex Slack, associate professor of architecture.

New theater students can audition for aid

Incoming students for the 1982-83 academic year with theater majors will be offered $200 scholarships by the Theater Program of the Department of Speech.

High school seniors, community college and transfer students may apply for the awards, which will be presented to outstanding students in the areas of performance, technical and design, and playwriting.

Auditions for the scholarships will take place in the Purple Masque Theatre during University Open House, March 26 and 27. Recipients must be enrolled as theater majors and be active in production activities in the theater program.

Biologist receives award for virus research

A faculty member in the Division of Biology has received an award of $36,616 from the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences.

Richard Consigli, professor of biology, is conducting a project entitled, "Characterization of Granulosis Virus Components." The research will focus on understanding the structure of the virus with primary emphasis on characterizing the virus structural proteins, indentifying intrinsic enzymes associated with the virus, and establishing a tissue culture system for this virus. Granulosis virus has acquired much interest in the scientific and agribusiness communities because of its basic and applied research potential. These viruses have applied interest in agriculture because they are currently being considered for use as biological insecticides to control economically important insects.

Upham scores well in Missouri track meet

One of the stars of the National Indoor Masters' Track and Field Meet held this month at William Jewell College, Liberty, Mo., was Jim Upham, associate director of student financial assistance.

Competing for the first time in the 60-64 age group, Upham, a one-time K-State track star, broke records for the 300-yard and 440-yard runs and finished third in the 60-yard dash.

Upham lowered the record for the 300-yard run from 53.2 to 41.8 seconds, and trimmed more than seven seconds off the 440-yard time, from 76.4 to 68.9 seconds.

Masters' competition is for persons over 40 years of age.

Professors receive science foundation grant

Two professors of nuclear engineering have received a $90,000 grant from the National Science Foundation.

Richard Faw, professor of nuclear engineering, and Thomas Lester, associate professor of nuclear engineering, are jointly conducting an engineering study on boiling phenomena under conditions of rapidly changing temperature and pressure.

According to the researchers, optical techniques will be used to study thermal conditions under which boiling begins. One of the goals of the study is to provide improved procedures for the design of industrial boilers and heat exchangers.

The first assault on the nuclear arms race is on the spirit, said Father Daniel Berrigan at the second lecture of the Lou Douglas series on arms control.

Berrigan spoke on "The Peace-Making Citizen and the War-Making State" before a capacity crowd in Union Forum Hall last night.

Berrigan was introduced as a follower of the long-established tradition of Christian men and women confined to speaking upon unpopular issues, by Robert D. Linder, professor of history.

This became evident when Berrigan said the problem of nuclear arms control rested in the human spirit, and civil disobedience.

"The first fact about nuclear weaponry is not a political fact, nor is it a military fact, it is a spiritual fact," Berrigan said.

"We have a history of testaments in which prophets make a stand somewhere and pay up and thus get things changed. In our own country we are gifted with a history in which nonviolent civil disobedience has brought social change," he said.

The crowd responded with loud cheers when Berrigan referred to the actions of the Plowshares Eight, a group of eight people (of which he is a member), who entered an electric plant housing nuclear weapons vehicles and damaged the nosecones of two re-entry vehicles with hammers, as the first act of civil disobedience in 35 years.

The crowd demonstrated particular support for Berrigan during a question and answer session which followed his speech.

When asked why the American press ignored the European peace movement, Berrigan said it was in collusion with large corporations that prevented it from becoming involved. Berrigan added that he is the "American Peace Movement."

Berrigan was also asked if the American people should lead demonstrations or educate themselves about proper political activity. His response was a call to action for citizens.

"We are over-educated and undermotivated," he said.

Berrigan was asked by a seminarian how he could stay involved in the isssues without getting "bounced out" of the church. Berrigan replied that he was not a good person to consult.

At times the audience wasn't content with asking questions of Berrigan. At one point a member of the audience rose and said, "Sometimes we do things out of fear — fear of invasion — or fear that someone will get there first."

Berrigan replied he copes with fear through prayer, discussion and sharing.

"Perfect love casts out fear of moral consequence. Fear can be dealt with. The substitute for fear is love," he said.

Another voice from the audience said, "Why don't you look for the nature of man?" A man is is meant to do what he's meant to do. You can't stop what he's doing without making him a robot."

In response a women interjected and said, "Freedom doesn't mean freedom to kill another human being."

The crowd applauded.

"What are good people to do. War has never been like this, weaponry has never been like this, politics have never been like this. It's a politics of death," Berrigan said.

Berrigan said Hitler's first assault was on the courts. In order to make his murders legal he inducted the courts in to a system where he destroyed the conscience of the judges. He told them the law is the law and to teach punishment in view of this.

"If the law is the law, the law of the land is the only law. There can be no law of God or human conscience," Berrigan said.

In the last year Berrigan said he has been more hopeful, especially within his own Catholic community.

"There has been an awakening among Catholics. The question of nuclear arms is beginning to be taken as a serious question," he said.

Effort to cut OMB budget results in fewer government publications

WASHINGTON (AP) — No longer will employees in the Bureau of Land Management office in Cheyenne, Wyo., see their pictures in a staff yearbook. Nor will the Agriculture Department publish a recipe book for poor people that tells how to stuff hard-boiled eggs with crabmeat.

For that matter, you won't be able to subscribe to Dimensions, the magazine published by the National Bureau of Standards, to learn what's new in the government's efforts to measure and weigh. The magazine doesn't exist anymore.

All three publications are casualties of President Reagan's campaign to cut the budget. When Reagan took office in January 1981, one of his first actions was to have the Office of Management and Budget order a halt to all new government films and publications, and a survey of existing publications to see which might be abandoned as unnecessary.

The deadline for finishing the survey is March 31, but the budget office concedes that because of the paperwork involved, that date won't be met.

With the onslaught of Reagan's initial budget cuts, many government agencies responded in part by producing fewer newsletters and magazines.

Figures from Uncle Sam's printer, the Government Printing Office, prove that fewer publications are being churned out. But no one seems to know exactly what is being printed.

Judith Morton of the GPO says the agency's current inventory is about 20,000 titles, including newsletters. Many publications are technical and have only limited appeal. About 80 percent of the GPO's customers are state and local governments and companies that do business with the federal government.

The four most popular publications among the public deal with child care. The best seller is "Infant Care," a Health and Human Services Department booklet that sells for $2.25 per copy.

Other popular titles are the three-volume "Backyard Mechanic," priced at $13.50; the "Dictionary of Occupation Titles," at $13.50 a copy, and the Public Health Service's "Medicine at Sea" at $17.

The GPO also operates 27 bookstores around the country, most in federal office buildings, and wants to close all but four to save an estimated $1.2 million. A congressional committee moved last week to keep them open, at least until auditors can determine if they are losing or making money.

The GPO loses money on most of its publications because of over-printing and because they often sell for about two-thirds what a commercial publishing house would charge. Hoping to change that, the GPO has hired a marketing director to find ways to make more money.

Reagan's austerity campaign notwithstanding, the government is one of the world's busiest publishers. The Commerce Department alone produces an estimated 1,000 publications. So does the Department of Health and Human Services. The figure is 1,200 for the Interior Department. At the Pentagon, the total is still being added up.

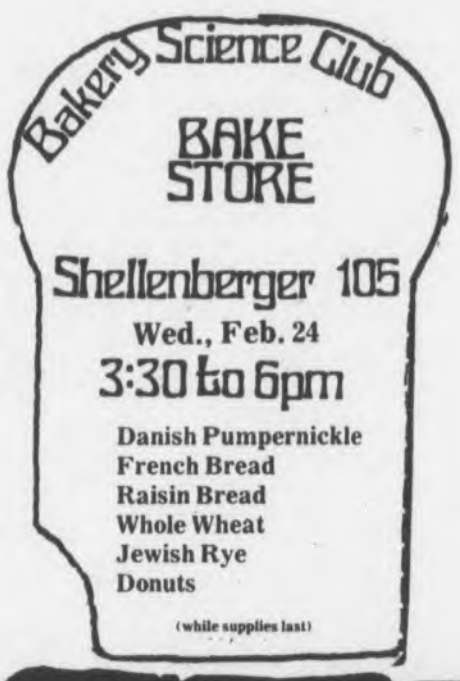
Still, Reagan claims to have made some progress. In his State of the Union address last month, he said his effort to reduce federal regulation had resulted in nearly 23,000 fewer pages in the Federal Register, the daily publication of federal regulations and notices.

Morton reported that in the fiscal year which ended Oct. 1, the GPO used 103.7 million pounds of paper, nearly 6 million pounds fewer than in the previous 12 months. She predicted a similar decrease this year.

Dimensions magazine was only one of an unknown number of publications to die as a result of Reagan's budget cuts last year. OMB officials cannot say how many have been abandoned, because the survey is still under way.

Dimensions editor Jan Kosko lost her job, but most staffers for defunct publications moved into other government positions.

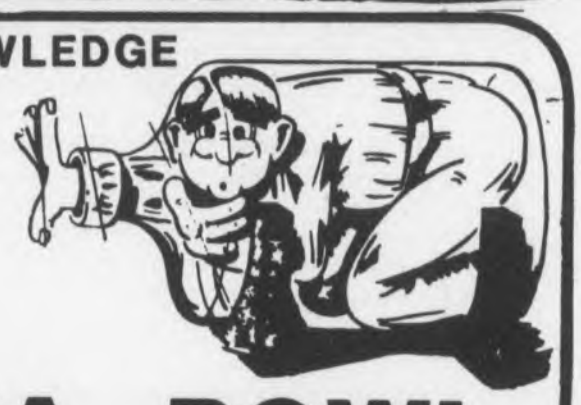
The OMB followed its own directive by printing fewer copies of Reagan's new fiscal 1983 budget, and distributing fewer free copies to members of Congress and the media.



The OMB prinited 33,963 copies of the budget this year, compared with 64,889 copies last year, and it gave away 16,963 copies compared with 41,899 last year. To save money, the OMB omitted the usual leather bindings for the two dozen volumes of the budget given to congressional leaders.

The overall savings so far have been considerable, said OMB spokeswoman Robin Rayborn. In fiscal 1981-82, $103.7 million was saved by eliminating publications, including $6,000 for the Bureau of Land Management yearbook in Cheyenne and $33,000 for the Agriculture Department recipe book.

The Commerce Department saved $325,000 by combining 13 internal magazines into one publication and another $50,000 by using a lower grade of paper for its magazine, "Business America," said Richard Valentine, a department spokesman.



In the new proposed budget he recently sent Congress, Reagan said he wants to continue the effort. He estimated there will be 7 percent fewer government publications in fiscal 1983 starting Oct. 1.

Young Bear's exhibit shows Indian heritage through art

By SCOTT KENYON
Staff Writer

It is never too late to begin a new career.

Leonard Young Bear began a career as an artist in 1974, at the age of 44. Young Bear, an American Indian of the Mesquakie Tribe in Iowa, was at K-State Monday and Tuesday for his Indian Art exhibition in the Union.

Young Bear said he's had no artistic training. He used to make pencil sketches as a child, but stopped at age 16.

Then, one evening in January 1974 he had a conversation with his two oldest sons who were attending Northern Iowa University, Cedar Falls.

"I told them that a guy doesn't have to go to school to be an artist," he said. "I could make myself known if I wanted to."

Young Bear then set about to prove his point. He began sketching during his lunch hours at the factory in Marshaltown, Iowa, where he worked. Word got around, and soon employees from other departments came to watch him work, he said.

"I gave a lot of my sketches away," he said, estimating that 50 to 100 were given away before a friend of Young Bear's show-o'clock in the morning?" asked Mallard.

"I didn't say I was horrified. What I meant was, I wasn't going to get out of the car," Williams replied.

Mallard pointed to inconsistencies in what Williams had told reporters at a news conference in June before his arrest and what he said at the trial.

Williams told the reporters he decided to search for the singer's address while running errands in the area, but the defendant and his mother both testified he left home for the specific purpose of finding the address, Mallard said. Williams told Mallard the statements showed no inconsistency. "I think it does," the prosecutor replied.

Mallard also asked Williams why he used the words "leaving the scene" during his news conference.

"Weren't you talking about the scene of the crime." Mallard asked.

"No," the defendant replied.

Mallard also grilled the defendant extensively about minor inconsistencies in the stories he gave at different times to different FBI agents about his reasons for being near the bridge.

Williams maintained he never changed his story, saying the agents simply wrote down the wrong information.

He told Mallard later, "Let me tell you something. Half the stuff you're talking about, I don't remember telling them. I was tired. It's impossible for me to remember every little thing."

He testified he was threatened by the FBI agents and police officers who stopped him near the bridge.

"I was scared to death," Williams said.

He said he asked a Georgia Bureau of Investigation agent "what was this all about. At first he didn't say.

"Then later, after I saw the task force identification card, I said, 'This is about the killings, isn't it?' And he said, 'Yes.' I just wanted to get that straight, that that was not the first question I askd ... I wasn't stupid, and I put 2 and 2 together as to what they wanted."

Williams also termed "absolute fiction" the testimony of Nellie Trammell, who claimed to have seen him in his car with a young black who was slumped over as if unconscious.

City schedules pool bond election

At a special meeting held Tuesday afternoon, Manhattan City Commisionerss voted unanimously to hold the Westside Swimming Pool bond election April 6.

Costs for construction of the proposed pool are expected to run about $950,000, according to City Manager Don Harmon. The yearly operating costs will run about $26,500, he said.

Public meetings will be scheduled so that literature on city financing of the project is available to Manhattan residents. Representatives from the Parks and Recreation Department are expected to be present at the meetings to answer questions concerning the pool proposal.

Commissioners also voted unanimously to install three new civil defense sirens in different locations of the city. The areas under consideration for new sirens are near the Sunset Cemetary, south of Amherst Avenue; the Cico Park area; and at Allen and Casement, by Northview Elementary School.

Conrad Company of Kansas City, Kan., was awarded the contract, although the company was not the low bidder. The company's bid was $20,819 for three units with radio-activated equipment. Alert Communications of America gave the lowest bid for the equipment, but, according to Bruce McCallum, Manhattan director of services, reports of quality control problems with Alert's equipment in other communities put the company out of contention.

The commissioners said they decided to go with the better quality system, which also will be more compatible with the current civil defense system.

"I would opt for the best civil defense signal for the community," Commissioner Dave Fiser said. "We're dealing with lives here."

The commissioners selected the radio-activated system to meet long-range needs.

According to McCallum, the current system, using phone line communications, is expensive and unreliable. Phone lines have been known to go out during emergencies. The radio-activated system is connected directly to the radio.

In other business, commissioners received a report from the Parks and Recreation Advisory Board stating the new priorities for the improvements at Sunset Zoo. Expansion of offices, changing restrooms to year-round facilities, renovation of the feline cages, and a new riding mower were mentioned in the report. The total cost is estimated at $69,438. Commissioners will continue discussion of the improvements program at a later meeting.

Opera-style Nooner tells tale of two sweethearts

A small sample of one of the operas to be performed at K-State March 4, 5 and 6 was presented in the Union Courtyard as the Tuesday Nooner.

The sample was a scene from "Gianni Schicchi," which will be presented with "Sister Angelica," another one-act opera.

The scene involves two sweethearts who are "madly and passionately" in love amid the strife caused by relatives fighting because an uncle/cousin died without leaving them any money. The sweethearts wish only for the fighting to stop and the issue to be resolved so they can have a dowry with which to marry.

The eight cast members played the scene with many exaggerated expressions and gestures.

One opera is a comedy, the other a lyrical tragedy, according to Linda Haynes, director.

Both will be sung in English, although they were originally written in Italian, she said.

"I think it's better for American audiences," she said.

The cast was chosen in December and has been practicing since returning to school, Haynes said.

ed the sketches to his wife.

"His wife studied art. She said that I shouldn't be giving my stuff away, and suggested some art shows," he said.

Young Bear's first sale was to the same friend for $2.

He made himself known in a hurry. The same year, he was invited to exhibit at the Iowa State Fair. He received honorable mention for his drawing "Mesquakie Lullaby," which he called a great honor as he was competing with professionals.

"Musquakie Lullaby" also took first place in the National Dairy Cattle Congress Art Show in 1976 and the Rosebud Sioux Tribal Pow-Wow All Indian Art Show in 1977.

"I made the clean sweep," he said, "first, second and third awards in the drawing and sketching catagory."

In 1978, the painting and sketching categories were combined. Young Bear, however, was undaunted. His drawing "Fast Thunder" won the best picture award.

Most of Young Bear's work is in charcoals and pastels. He has done some water colors and said that he would like to get into acrylics and more water color, but it is difficult because he can usually work only at night.

Young Bear holds a regular job as a carpenter for the Musquakie Housing authority.

Young Bear's work is strictly traditional Indian art, mostly portraits. For four years he has made only limited editions.

"I've had prints made to keep tab on my stuff and how I've progressed," he said. "I've improved quite a bit." He said that while he used to turn out one drawing in a day each one now takes up to two weeks.

In 1976, Young Bear did several illustrations for the book "Mesquakie and Proud of It."

Although he has exhibited his work at several colleges in Iowa, K-State was his first out-of-state exhibition.

"I am greatly honored to have occasion to show my work," he said.

"I have sold originals to people from Japan, people from Germany and two or three people from Australia," he said.

K-State economist discounts industry use of tax model

TOPEKA (AP) — Calling it a "poor quality piece of work," a K-State economist Tuesday blasted an $80,000 study commissioned by the Kansas oil and gas industry on the economic impact of a severance tax.

M. Jarvin Emerson, who developed the basic economic model on which the study was based, warned lawmakers against relying on the report. He said it improperly used his work, conveyed "misleading" impressions, and contained "nonsense."

The report, financed by three oil and gas producer groups, was prepared by the Midwest Research Institute of Kansas City, Mo. It was the industry's prime weapon in testimony against severance tax proposals, and concluded that enactment of any severance tax would damage the state's economy.

But Emerson, in testimony before the House Assessment and Taxation Committee, cautioned legislators not to draw any "inference" from the MRI about enactment of a tax.

"The model was not developed for that particular purpose," Emerson said, adding that he was not taking a position on the cntroversial tax on oil and gas production.

An MRI economist who supervised the report later appeared before the committee to respond to Emerson, and reaffirmed the report's findings.

"He (Emerson) is very much welcome to his opinion on the quality of the work," said Bruce Morgan of MRI. "Economists differ ... just as legislators differ."

However, some lawmakers attending the committee meeting said Emerson's testimony had erased any credibility of the oil and gas study.

"It definitely blows the whole report to pieces," House Minority Leader Fred Weaver (D-Baxter Springs) said of Emerson's testimony.

Weaver, who is sponsoring a severance tax proposal for Gov. John Carlin, has attended nearly all the committee's meetings.

Even Rep. James Braden (R-Wakefield), the committee chairman, acknowledged that Emerson's testimony was damaging.

"It doesn't help it any. I had no idea he (Emerson) was going to criticize the report as strongly as he did."

Emerson appeared before the committee at Braden's request because the professor's "Kansas input-output model" was the foundation of the severance tax study, and the report's preface "gratefully acknowledged" Emerson's assistance.

"After reading the study I was even more distressed to find my name associated with what I consider to be a poor quality piece of work," Emerson said.

KC banker offers to underwrite philharmonic

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Kansas City banker R. Crosby Kemper Jr. announced Tuesday that the Crosby Kemper Foundation would underwrite loans to help the financially troubled Kansas City Philharmonic complete its 1981-82 season.

The Philharmonic board of governors had announced the cancellation of the remaining 19 weeks of the 42-week season last Saturday, after failing to raise enough money to continue the season. The Philharmonic had projected an $800,000 deficit at the end of the year if the season continued.

No exact amount was given for the assistance, but Kemper told the board of governors the money would put the orchestra "in the black.

"I think it's very important for the spiritual life of this city," said Kemper, chairman of the United Missouri Bank of Kansas City. "It's the basis for everything in the performing arts we have."

The Crosby Kemper Foundation is a charitable organization set up through the will of the late R. Crosby Kemper Sr., chairman of the board of the City National Bank and Trust Co. of Kansas City, who died in 1972.

The foundation previously had donated money and artworks to Kansas City cultural organizations such as the Philharmonic, Starlight Theatre, Lyric Theatre and Nelson Art Gallery.

The orchestra had suffered a $120,000 cut in state funding and owed short-term debts of $150,000 and salaries of $100,000.

Fund-raising efforts, including donation requests at performances and a 26-hour telethon, had raised about $270,000 by Saturday.

Kemper said a strong business approach and a strong business manager would help keep the Philharmonic out of financial trouble.

"The support is here, I just think there's got to be a positive effort and a lot more positive thinking about this instead of negative thinking. I think there has been mismanagement."

Kemper said he did not think the present head of the Philharmonic Association, Norman Kahn, had mismanaged the orchestra. He said past mistakes had made the business community unwilling to support the orchestra.

Kahn said work would begin quickly to set up an endowment fund to prevent future financial problems for the orchestra.

Wildcats sweep KU

TOP: Priscilla Gary knocks the ball away during first-half action. ABOVE: Loyal supporters the cheer the Wildcats on to their victory over K.U.

K-State's basketball teams have made a total dynasty of the Sunflower Basketball Classics. Four times the Wildcats and the Kansas Jayhawks have met this season (twice for the women and twice for the men), and each time K-State has come out on top.

Tuesday night was no exception as the women's team posted its 13th straight victory, downing the 'Hawks 80-69.

It was a contest that that matched high scoring centers Tammie Romstad of K-State, and KU's Tracy Claxton. Claxton was the only Jayhawk to score in double figures, but her 30 points were high for both teams. Romstad poured in 23 for herself, but while the 'Hawks were keying on the 6-2 senior, Barbara Gilmore slipped in for 20 points, and Priscilla Gary added 13.

K-State Head Coach Lynn Hickey was pleased with the play of the entire team, especially with the first half.

"It was a big win for us," Hickey said. "Barbara Gilmore played great game. She hit the boards hard and shot well too.

"We didn't play as well as we could have in the second half, but when you're playing Kansas, you'll happily take any win."

The contest was dictated by momentum as was most evident in the first half.

K-State grabbed the early momentum when Gary scored on a driving layup at the 18:53 mark. This ignited ignited the partisan crowd of 2,450, one of the largest crowds to view a women's game this season.

Claxton tied things up shortly after when she stole the ball and made and scored. The teams traded baskets until the 15:42 mark when Romstad took an assist from Betsy Slaon for a score off the glass.

The 'Cats reeled off six unanswered points, and when Romstad scored on a layin with 14:13 remaining in the half, K-State was up by 10, 16-6.

Angie Snider hit a pair of freethrows cutting the Wildcat lead to eight points. The next four minutes belonged to the 'Cats.

Gilmore played a custodial role for the 'Cats as she cleaned up all the missed shots and converted them into easy buckets.

The 6-0 sophomore recorded seven rebounds on the night. One of which came with 13:33 left in the first half. Gilmore assumed position in front of Claxton, snatched a missed shot by Gary and muscled it back in.

Gary followed with a layup and Romstad added a jumper from underneath upping the Wildcats lead to 22-8 with 12:20 to go.

It wasn't until the 7:56 mark that the Jayhawks started their roll. Barbara Adkins made two charity shots off a foul by K-State's Jean Roise, then Claxton scored on back-to-back shots underneath, narrowing the Wildcat margin to 33-22.

(See 'CATS, back page)

Tried and true fans

Along with today's cold front came a breath of fresh air as a particular group of Wildcat fans pulled out their long underwear and headed for the women's basketball game.

This group of Wildcat fans are best described by Head Coach Lynn Hickey as "true Wildcat fans."

They are similar to the front row fanatics seen at the men's basketball games; however, there is one difference. You never know what they are going to show up in.

At the championship game when K-State played Colorado for the Big Eight title, they showed up in suits just because it was the "championship."

At another game, when fortunately the temperature on the inside was as hot as the 'Cats were because it was colder than dry ice outside, they made their appearance in suit jackets and shorts.

This group is not an elite or selective group, but they are a supportive group which gives recognition to the 'Cats. There are 15 to 20 of them — friends. All but four who live in an off-campus house, live in Marlatt Hall.

A couple of them met a few of the women basketball players at a party and since then things started mushrooming.

Besides entertaining the crowds at the women's basketball games and bringing "excitement to the crowd, they are an inspiration" to the team, Erin Schreiber said.

"They are crazy, loyal and like brothers to the whole team," she said.

"They're what makes Ahearn. It's K-State," Tammie Romstad, said.

"HONKEY-TONK Queen"—Here are some clues: Friday we were "On the Road Again" to KU to visit an "airhead." Rossville was quite an experience, thanks to J.D. But it was "High Time" for Moe and Joe to go out for "Another Honkey-Tonk Night on Broadway." However, I found myself "Stuck Right in the Middle" and "Holdin the Bag." Now it's just a "Sweet Yesterday." Good thing there's "Only One You," but til a quarter till 5?! Maybe this weekend we'll see Chuck, "The Clown," overdrive, "Delta Dawn," and some weekend friends. —FYI (This is getting expensive!) —BFD, right? "Bobbie Sue." (108)

CARLIN—HAPPY Birthday!! Hope you have a great day!! A couple of your Rockin' K friends: P.S. Come down Friday afternoon if you can. (108)

BUDDY—ARE you surprised? Am I a day late? Or else what if I keep up at this rate, my bill will be 2,097,152 by the end of the month!! Sorry about spoiling your surprise, it's the thought that counts. I love you, let's go for 4 more. Brewski. (108)

ATTENTION: BEAUTIFUL blondes we met Saturday night at the Pladium in Lawrence, alias Jan and Kelly from Ford Hall. At least that's what you told us! Let's get in touch! Tom (144) and Curt (142), 539-8211. (108-109)

TOM G.: Here's to your first personal at K-St. Thanxs for the great times we've spent together over the past month. Steph. (108)

KCCSC-ers: This weekend was just awesome! From "Cat Scratch Fever" to "Bonita Bananas" you all were super. Next year will be even "awesomer!" Love and peace always—Suzy. (108)

T.S., D.W., B.F. and J.K.: Recovered? Some party huh? Too bad T.S. and J.S. had to leave so early and miss all the excitement like: standing ovations (right B.F. and V.T.?) By the way, 3:30 in the morning? But then there's D.W. and T.O. until 5:00! D.W. backwards spells laid? Ask T.O. Poor J.K., stranded at T.S.'s while L.R. was at home bowing to the porcelain goddess! Next time, wait for the 7-up! Let's dance and pass out. Wild hairs!! J.S. was horny but couldn't do anything about it 9 times. (Remember B.F., 2 more) Took guts, T.S. Better luck next time. More (or less) self control and we'll all be able to accomplish more!! Poor T.S. got ignored whenever J.S. was paying B.F. "Why won't anybody talk to me?" Don't worry, if T.S. and J.S. had stayed, they'd have gotten a standing ovulation too!! So much for being caught in public. Is that less embarassing than in private, D.W., and T.O.? How was the late movie Lucy Loose Lips? Get psyched for a repeat performance soon! Lust, Fellow Experimentors. (108)

DAVID G.: What a nice surprise—chocolates!! Thanks for thinking of me. Hope your semester is going great. Patty. (108)

MURPH—HAPPY 20th. Let's see if you can stay sober for this one—Clyde. (108)

SEARS: TO a super girl and a fun weekend. Thanks for going. I had fun and really appreciated yours. G. (108)

BILL: DREAMS can come true. (108)

KYLEBARE: JUST because I understand, doesn't mean I have to like it. Take some time out for fun, please. Karlkins. (108)

PIGLET THE Pirate—Sorry that this is late, but did you actually think we would forget your birthday? Never! So put your worries aside. Pegg Leggs, because we gave you the time of your life yesterday! Happy Birthday!—Stretch and Munchkin. (108)

SHARRAEI?: THE Bowling Queen; average so low, tongue so mean. Parties with you are always obscene, but life without you wouldn't be keen. The Humble Ones. (108)

SHAWNAE—JUST wanted to say thanx. I'll love ya always, K.J. (108)

KAPPA SIGS, Bob and Gary: Thanx so much for Saturday night! We both had the best time. Love, a couple of fat hens (K and J) (108)

Men gear for grudge match

Revenge is not the only thing the Wildcats will be looking for in tonight's match against Big Eight rivals, the Missouri Tigers. A win for the 'Cats would enhance their chances for the home court advantage in the first round of the Big Eight tournament.

K-State, 18-6 and 8-4 in conference play after a sweet victory over the Jayhawks on Saturday, is struggling to regain the momentum they had before the first match between the two teams. They are also looking to repay the Tigers for the loss which broke their 20 game home-court winning streak.

In the last match-up, the Wildcats dominated action early in the game leading the way through most of the first half, but after two free throws from Steve Stipanovich and a 10-foot loft from Ricky Frazier in the final seconds of the first half, the Wildcats left the court with a one point deficit that they never relinquished.

In the second half, the 'Cats had a chance to come back as the Tigers experienced trouble converting free throws. Head Coach Jack Hartman said that the additional number of fouls was not indicative of a zone defense.

Missouri shot 60.5 percent during the game with Stipanovich making 9 of 11 from the field and two free throws for a total of 20 points. Jon Sundvold also added 7 of 10 from the field for 14 total points.

In conference play this season, Randy Reed and Tyrone Adams have led the 'Cats with a 14.5 scoring average. Ed Nealy still leads the conference in rebounding with an 8.4 average, but he is averaging less than 12 points a game.

The Wildcats have shot 49.7 percent in their last eleven games compared to 55 percent in the first 12 games.

Romstad scored on a freethrow after that, but KU's Smith added a fast break layup with 6:21 to go. Then Claxton made a jumper in lane making the score 34-26.

K-State closed the first half outscoring the 'Hawks 7-2 in the final 1:30. Angie Bonner capped a 47-29 lead when she hit a bank shot at the buzzer off a feed from Sloan.

Hickey said the Jayhawk rallies were because of the game's fast pace.

"We were having trouble getting back on defense, and Kansas got a lot of easy bucket because of it," Hickey said. "On the other hand, we were really getting the ball down court on offense. I thought Kansas made a real good effort to get back in the game in the second half. I'm just glad we had that 18-point lead."

Williams' defense rests after angry outbursts

ATLANTA (AP) — Wayne B. Williams' lawyers rested their case Wednesday after the defendant, showing the strain of three days on the witness stand, denounced his prosecutor as "a fool" and ridiculed the murder case against him as "a bunch of hearsay mess."

But the prosecution battled back with two rebuttal witnesses who suggested Williams and his parents lied when they said a green carpet in their home from which key fiber evidence was taken had been purchased in 1968.

Another rebuttal witness described once seeing Williams become enraged at his father and "start beating and pushing" him — an incident which the elder Williams denied ever took place.

And Floyd J. Fowler Jr., a newsstand employee, testified that Williams came into his store several times to buy magazines featuring karate, electronics and male nudes. Prosecutors contend Williams is a homosexual who knows karate, but he has denied both claims.

DURING THE morning cross-examination, Williams, a 23-year-old black free-lance photographer and self-styled talent promoter, appeared on the verge of tears and acknowledged he had been "through a lot" as he engaged in a series of angry exchanges with Assistant District Attorney Jack Mallard.

"Nobody can say that I did anything. All you got is a bunch of hearsay mess," Williams asserted, sticking to the claims of innocence he has made since police first questioned him last May.

Prosecutors began presenting rebuttal witnesses later in the day, calling fiber expert Larry Peterson to dispute a defense expert who said fibers used to link Williams to the slayings could have come from other sources.

THE DEFENSE expert testified that carpet fibers taken at random from a downtown office building matched fibers found on the victims, but Peterson said his own examination showed no match.

At one point during the morning's cross-examination, Williams told Mallard, "You must be a fool."

"Didn't you feel that you were outdoing the police?" asked Mallard.

Caribbean assistance plan designed to ensure peace

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Reagan unveiled a program of trade, investment assistance and direct financial aid for the troubled countries of Central America and the Caribbean Wednesday, and declared he "will do whatever is prudent and necessary" to ensure peace and security there.

Reagan said he will ask for $350 million in additional funds for the region this year and warned in his speech to the Organization of American States: "If we do not act promptly and decisively in defense of freedom, new Cubas will arise from the ruins of today's conflicts."

He branded it a "crisis in the Caribbean."

The president, delivering his long-awaited plan to aid the nation's neighbors to the south, mixed details of proposed assistance for nations seeking help, based on "the magic of the market of the Americas," with angry words aimed at Cuban and other leftist influence in the region, and an offer of increased military aid.

"The positive opportunity is illustrated by the two-thirds of the nations in the area which have democratic governments," Reagan said. "The dark future is foreshadowed by the poverty and repression of Castro's Cuba, the tightening grip of the totalitarian left in Grenada and Nicaragua, and the expansion of Soviet-backed, Cuban-managed support for violent revolution in Central America."

The president said his Caribbean Basin Initiative includes:

—A program of 12 years of free trade for products made in the region — although some 87 percent of the area's exports already enter the United States duty free. Textiles and apparel, covered by international trade agreements, would be exempted from this provision.

—The $350 million appropriation, to "be concentrated on the private sector." The assistance would raise the 1982 total for the region to $824.9 million, almost double the 1981 spending. Officials have said the $350 million would be primarily for six nations suffering short term balance of payments problems: El Salvador, Hondoras, Costa Rica, Belize, Jamaica and the Dominican Republic.

—An offer of assistance in investment promotion, export marketing and technology transfer efforts.

—Unspecified help for Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands.

Accreditation examination squad scrutinizes K-State

By BETH BAKER
Collegian Reporter

A team of eight administrators and faculty from various universities evaluated K-State this week for accreditation purposes, according to Owen Koeppe, provost. The last time K-State was reviewed as a whole for accreditation was February 1972, Koeppe said.

The team is chosen by the North Central Association (NCA) of Colleges and Schools and consists of faculty members (from universities in Arkansas, Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, Ohio, Washington and Wisconsin). In the two and a half days they were here, team members looked over the entire campus. They did not examine specific programs, Koeppe said.

"There's nothing that would have been inappropriate for them to look at," he said.

Members of the team talked to deans, department heads and faculty and student leaders as part of the campus evaluation.

Faculty Senate was asked what role it plays within the University community, according to Heinz Bulmahn, president of Faculty Senate and associate professor of modern language. The conversation was "fairly optimistic," he said.

FUNDING AND attitudes of students were also considered in the review, according to Koeppe, and each college was visited by a member of the team. The group also talked to three members of the Kansas Board of Regents on Monday. Koeppe said instructional facilities and support facilities such as the library, student counseling and financial aid were also reviewed.

This evaluation is a routine, periodic check done in all schools associated with the NCA, according to President Duane Acker. Acker said the team looked at such things as the number of volumes, usage and square footage in the library. The team was also looking at student-to-teacher ratios and soliciting opinions and attitudes of teachers and students, Acker said.

"We send them (the association and the team) a lot of information before they get here and then there's a lot more detail they see and review when they get here, as they see fit," Koeppe said.

The NCA, he added, will provide K-State with a draft report summarization of the findings of the evaluation by late March. The University will then have a chance to comment on factual parts of the report, but not on the opinions expressed in the report. A final draft will be received in mid-April, Koeppe said.

THE REPORT will probably contain short comments about points, strengths and concerns at K-State, Koeppe said.

The actual voting on the decision of whether or not K-State will continue to be accredited will not take place until June, and it will be done by The Commission on Institutions of Higher Education, a subdivision of the NCA, according to Koeppe.

Preparation for the accreditation team's visit began almost two years ago, according to Donald Hoyt, director of education resources. Hoyt and David Mugler, associate dean of agriculture, traveled to Chicago at that time and were briefed on the criteria for the evaluation.

According to Hoyt, an institution must satisfy four general criteria. It must: — have clearly and publicly stated purposes appropriate to higher education institutions.

Former student killed; award made in his honor

Donald Martin, former student in journalism and mass communications, died Monday in a fall while working on a construction site in Chanute.

Martin had left school after last semester to earn money to finance his final semester, according to family and friends. He was to return in the fall.

A trumpet player for the KSU Marching Band for five years, he was considered an enthusiastic asset, said Phil Hewett, director of the band.

A scholarship for freshman has been named the Don Martin Spirit Award.

"The reason we designated it a freshman scholarship was because in all the years he was in the band he really exemplified the spirit a freshman has," Hewett said. "He just has a special attraction to him."

Nicknamed "Wrongway," Martin delighted in telling new band members how he had exited the KSU Stadium field on the wrong sideline after a half-time performance, Hewett said.

Hewett added that Martin was proud of the nickname, and always had the ability to turn embarassing moments into humorous ones.

During the fall semester Martin served as a disc jockey for KSDB. He handled the 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. country and western show on Thursday nights. He planned to become a disc jockey after he had completed school.

Donations to the Martin scholarship fund can be made through the KSU Foundation.

He is survived by his mother and father, Mr. and Mrs. Loren Martin, of Clay Center; four sisters: Sharon Martin, junior in microbiology; Merrie Martin, sophomore in speech; Joan Martin, freshman in general; Loretta Martin; and maternal grandparents Mr. and Mrs. L.O. Heckethorn, Manhattan.

Durland phase II progressing well despite weather

In spite of cold winter weather, construction continues on the second phase of the Durland Hall project.

"Considering the weather, I think it's (construction) going very well," said Vince Cool, director of planning and architectural services.

The construction crew closed in a portion of the basement and did some fireproofing in that area during January. Some steel structures were erected during the cold weather, according to Cool.

Frost, which leaves the building ground area soft, is a problem workers are currently confronted with, Cool explained.

"We need more days like Monday to dry things out. It's not going at the speed at which it could if every day were like Monday," Cool said.

The building is expected to be finished for the fall of 1983, when it will house the engineering department. The dean's office will also be relocated in the new building when it is completed.

U.S., corporation, assume Titan mishap liability

WICHITA — The federal court trial of lawsuits seeking more than $50 million in damages in connection with a 1978 Titan II missile accident was halted Wednesday when the U.S. government and Martin Marietta Corp. agreed to assume liability for the mishap.

The trial, which was in its third week, was to decide who would pay damages if they were awarded to 36 persons who claimed they were injured on Aug. 24, 1978, when more than 13,000 gallons of deadly oxidizer propellant leaked from a missile silo near Rock. Two Air Force missile crew members were killed in the accident.

The government and Martin Marietta, the government's primary contractor for the Titan program, were defendants in the suits, along with Fairchild Industries, the manufacturer of a valve used on the Titan II. Wednesday's settlement allowed Fairchild to be dismissed from the suits.

After the development Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Patrick Kelly urged lawyers for both sides to attempt to reach an out-of-court settlement in the case. He tentatively scheduled a trial in June to determine damages.

Senate hears bill involving firearms, sentencing

TOPEKA — The Senate Judiciary Committee Wednesday heard a bill which requires a minimum mandatory sentence when a person is convicted of a crime where a firearm is used.

There is a state law imposing a mandatory minimum sentence for crimes involving firearms as well as rape and aggravated sodomy.

However, a November 1981 state appeals court ruling said the law did not apply to attempted crimes involving firearms.

The court made the ruling in a case involving Rodney Sutton who kidnapped a person near Goodland in August 1978. In a scuffle, Sutton's gun fired twice with one shot grazing the victim's face.

Sutton plead guilty to attempted murder and was given the minimum mandatory sentence of at least four years before consideration for parole.

His appeal argued attempted murder was not included in the minimum mandatory provision and therefore he could be paroled at an earlier date. The appeals court agreed and ruled in his favor.

The new bill would expand the minimum mandatory provision to include criminal attempts where firearms are involved.

Careless smoking causes fire; blaze kills boy

TOPEKA — Careless smoking caused a fire that swept through an apartment house, killing a 5-year-old boy and injuring three members of his family, fire officials said Wednesday.

The blaze started when a cigarette apparently ignited a couch in a first-floor apartment, said Dick Parton, district fire chief.

The victim of the fire was identified as Thomas Dorsey.

Parton said the boy's mother, Annie May Emery, 22, and two of her other children, 2-year-old Harvey Nelson and 4-year-old Elizabeth Pleasent, were injured in the Tuesday night blaze, which caused about $20,000 damage to the apartment house.

The Nelson boy was reported in critical condition Wednesday. Emery and the girl were hospitalized in satisfactory condition.

Parton said the fire began about 10 p.m. in a lower apartment of the three-story frame house. Firefighters battled the blaze for about 45 minutes before bringing it under control.

Congress to probe possible misappropriations

WASHINGTON — Interior Secretary James G. Watt improperly used government funds to throw two Christmas receptions and must reimburse the government at least $4,300, federal auditors have ruled.

The U.S. comptroller general also said "questions could be raised" about Watt's use of an additional $4,500 from his official reception fund to pay for the events.

However, the opinion said, "we will not object" to use of those funds because "agency heads have traditionally been accorded a great deal of discretion" in their use.

The opinion, dated Tuesday, was obtained Wednesday by The Associated Press. It is expected to be a focus of a congressional hearing Friday on Watt's social use of historic Arlington House in Arlington National Cemetery.

"We expect Mr. Watt to appear at our hearing with checkbook in hand ready to repay the misappropriated funds," said Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), who is holding the hearing.

There was no immediate comment from Watt. "We have not seen that report yet and would not be able to comment on it," said Interior Department spokesman Phil Million.

The auditor's opinion involved a Dec. 14 breakfast and Dec. 17 cocktail party held at Arlington House, also known as the Curtis-Lee Mansion.

Theory changes are also required

Quick turnabouts of national policy are hard to accept without an inherent suspicion. Such is the feeling that arises with Secretary of Interior James Watt's announcement that he intends to request a bill by Congress which will forbid mining and drilling in wilderness areas until the end of the century. The bill would have one exception, the president would be allowed to withdraw acreage to meet the national need.

Why the continued suspicion of Watt? One statement that exemplifies his original direction of action toward our nation's wilderness. "Our goal has always been to have the wilderness drilled or mined last..."

Watts, as a born-again Christian, believes and has stated on national television that the wilderness areas should be utilized before the world ends, presumably at any time. By inflicting these religiously tainted views on the entire nation's wilderness reserves seems to be a violation of the Constitution's guarantee of the right to religious freedom.

Perhaps the angry outcries across the nation have made their impact. Or maybe his quick turnabout could be a public relations action on the behalf of the current administration, one which flinches at any shade of public disapproval.

Watt's proposal also sets deadlines for future creation of wilderness areas — current proposals must be acted upon by the end of 1983 and any new proposals must be made by 1987.

The beauty and wonders of the outdoors should survive for generations, at any date and time.

Government aids another industry

The government has once again come to the aid of ailing U.S. industries.

In a moment of lucid thought, the powers that be have decided to place import restrictions on a commodity produced both by American and foreign companies.

It seems the industry is in need of a shot in the arm, and the government intends to help out.

Other industries feeling the brunt of foreign competition will be happy to know the government is doing its best to protect the interest of the five companies and 427 employees in the clothespin industry.

A 'tail' of young love

It was in the late autumn when he came to live with me.

Leaving all of my roommates in the dust, I set out on my own for my senior year of college.

I found a small house, far from the street, that protected me from any invasion of my solitude. It was the perfect place to study, to not study or to do about anything else that I wanted to. Best of all, it was cheap.

Then why, you might ask, would I let him move in with me? Frankly, it was lonely there. Nobody to talk to when I came home at night. I guess I needed somebody to depend on me a little. I don't know.

To really understand this story, you need to be told something about his background.

HE HAD LIVED with a girl named Barbara. They had gotten along quite well. She took care of most of his needs, fed him and cleaned up after him.

They had a good relationship, at least at first. Then Barbara met another guy. She tried to save their relationship, but the new guy said that he had to go.

He then moved in with a mutual friend of ours, Gale. He and Gale got on well enough, but there were problems right from the start.

Gale had lived alone for some time, and did not have a lot of space for him. He was always bugging Gale and after a few weeks, it was just too much for her to handle.

I first found out about him one day when I was talking to Gale.

IT WAS OBVIOUSLY time for him to move on, and they both knew it. I knew pretty well what I was getting into, and offered to let him move in with me even before I met him.

I was suprised to meet him that same evening. He is really quite striking in appearance, with big clear eyes almost the exact color of his tossled, light colored hair. He is not especially attractive but his lean build and long face give him a clearly distinctive look.

While in every apparent way he was a adult, mentally he was very childish. He seemed to live for no greater pleasure than clowning and playing around. Although at first I admired this outlook, it has since worn quite thin and at times even caused some temperamental outbursts on my part against him.

Then she came into the picture.

OVER SEMESTER BREAK, her family went to California and asked me to look in on her, as she could nt make the trip. This seemed to not entail too much effort on my part, so I agreed to do it.

She was a lovely young thing, just entering the stage in life that would turn her from an innocent child to a beautiful woman. When he met her, the twoof them did not get along well at all, but that was not a suprise to me after all that he had been through.

She was not happy at home all alone. The neighbors warned me that she kept leaving the house alone late at night and they were concerned for her safety. They offered to let her stay with them, but I felt obligated.

I didn't want to take her to my house, but after she stayed out overnight, I felt that there was no choice.

THE DAY AFTER she came to stay with us, I had to go out of town overnight. I was concerned to leave them alone overnight, with them fighting and all, but again there was no choice.

I was suprised to arrive home the next day to find that they had settled their differences and were quite friendly to each other. The rest of her stay with us was pleasant, and he seemed upset when she eventually went home.

A short time later, the truth became known. She was pregnant. I was angry with the both of them. I thought that she was too young to continue the pregnancy, but her family insisted that she see it through.

The current plan is to put the offspring up for adoption.

Now that you have heard this sordid tale of loose morality and teenage pregnancy, I have but one question t ask of you, the reader.

Do you know anybody who wants a kitten?

Petition is a misleading danger to the Constitution

Editor,

I would like to comment on some of the remarks made in the Feb. 19 article, "Students protest 'anti-U.S. materials'."

John Markiewicz seemed to be concerned that many people weren't signing his petition because of some misinterpretation of the word "oppose." The meaning of "oppose" is not what is in question here. We all know what "oppose" means. The question is just what is it that is being opposed? Markiewicz's petition "oppose(s) the distribution of anti-U.S. materials on our campus." I don't think that this is what most of the people who signed the petition really wanted to say.

There is a difference between opposing the content of the materials and opposing the distribution of these same materials. Opposing the content is exercising freedom of speech, a right guaranteed by the Constitution. Opposing the distribution, as the petition does, is opposing the exercise of freedom of speech, which amounts to opposing a fundamental constitutional right.

I think that many people failed to make this vital distinction before they signed the petition. I think they oppose the "anti-U.S. materials" that are being handed out, but they don't oppose the exercise of constitutional rights for anybody, as the petition does. Since the petition was somewhat misleading in this respect, those who don't really want to protest free speech rights for foreign students should simply retract their signatures from Markiewicz's petition.

But to those of you who signed the petition knowing precisely what it meant, aren't you aware of the dangers involved in chiseling away basic constitutional rights? And don't you find it a bit paradoxical that you have signed an anti-Constitutional statement in an effort to keep anti-U.S. materials off campus.?

Free speech is a two-way avenue

Editor,

Had I gone through the Union last Wednesday I would have gladly signed "the pad" to register my disgust at the conduct of Iranian students in the U.S. I am not a fascist nor do I believe in the suppression of ideas contrary to my own, but I get a bit riled at people like Pat Esken and Mo who would suppress my counterpoint.

I have no qualms with allowing foreigners to reside here — after all, at one point or another all of us have foreign roots — however, I expect to be able to exercise my right to speak freely just as the Iranian students do. I just cannot stomach the standard bleeding-heart liberal crap which promotes the suppression of views contrary to those of poor disadvantaged minorities. If they want their emotional outbursts respected they must respect mine.

If the Iranian students intend to return home someday I can understand their actions as patriotic defense of their homeland. On the other hand, if they intend to hide in the U.S. from the perpetrators of their glorious revolution I suggest they learn to speak English and become Americans.

Foreign policy is criticism's target

Editor,

It is unfortunate to see that a great many Americans in general, and Mr. John Markiewicz in particular, have misunderstood the message that the Iranian students are trying to spread. The cultural differences, lack of correct communications and biased and incomplete media coverage of different events and situations are all causes of the tensions that are created between Americans and Iranians.

I would like all Americans to know that Iranian people in general, and myself in particular, love and respect them. It is the American foreign policy that we are critical of. I am sure that there are only a handful of politicians who are in charge of the American foreign policy, not the people of this country. I believe it is not the people of the United States who support the illegal and the right wing military dictator regime of El Salvador, rather it is the few politicians who are supporting it. I also believe that these few politicians are influenced by multi-national corporations whose interests will be in jeopardy in case the current regime in El Salvador falls.

I hope this letter could clear up and solve some of the misunderstandings that exist among us.

Severance tax argued...

TOPEKA (AP) — The oil and gas industry fired its parting shots Wednesday in the early battle over a severance tax on mineral production, defending an $80,000 study it uses to oppose the finance proposal.

Bruce Morgan, an economist who supervised the economic study on the effects of a severance tax on the Kansas economy, reaffirmed his report's findings in an appearance before the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee.

"We stand by those conclusions," said Morgan, who supervised the study for the Midwest Research Institute of Kansas City, Mo. It concluded that enactment of any severance tax would greatly damage the state's economy.

That study, commissioned by three oil and gas producer groups, came under fire Tuesday from a K-State economist who counseled lawmakers in a House panel to discount the report and called it "a poor quality piece of work."

MORGAN TESTIFIED before the Senate committee as it wrapped up hearings on a bill which would enact Gov. John Carlin's proposed severance tax on oil, gas and coal production. Only opponents of the proposal appeared Wednesday, as supporters testified the day before.

Morgan's remarks came less than 24 hours after M. Jarvin Emerson, a professor of economics at K-State, blasted the oil and gas study. Emerson, who developed the economic model on which the study was based, told the House tax committee Tuesday not to draw any inferences from the study because it improperly applied aspects of his work.

The study was the industry's prime weapon against five severance tax proposals which are before the Legislature. The House committee, which concluded its hearings Tuesday, is expected to begin deliberation Thursday on four severance tax measures before it.

THE SENATE COMMITTEE heard from nearly a dozen severance tax opponents Wednesday on the only bill it has. That is Carlin's proposal, as introduced by Senate Democrats, to levy a 5 percent tax on oil and gas and a 2 percent tax on coal.

All of the foes, including the Independent Oil and Gas Association, a group of southwest Kansas counties and the Kansas Farm Bureau, recited arguments now familiar to lawmakers. The groups contended the tax measure would unfairly single out the oil industry to bear a greater tax burden, erode the property tax base of some counties, and force abandonment of some marginal production wells.

Morgan said MRI was not taking a position on the severance tax. But he focused on the credibiility of its report, and Emerson's complaint that his model has been improperly used.

"We have faithfully followed his methodologies," Morgan said.

IN A LETTER given earlier in the day to members of both taxation committees, Morgan advanced the same defense: "It is unfortunate that our credibility has been challenged because we have applied the model to one of the purposes for which it was originally intended."

He added: "We feel a major change in state tax policy toward any industry would fit most reasonable interpretations about the appropriateness of using the model to evaluate economic impact."

Sen. Bud Burke (R-Leawood) said the Senate committee would not act on a severance tax proposal until the House votes.

"We're going to wait and see what the House sends over. We want to see what form they are talking about," Burke said.

Last year, Burke's committee killed Carlin's severance tax bill after the House passed it. And just like last session, the severance tax proposal has been given to two Senate committees, which means both must approve it for the measure to reach the floor.

...compromise likely

TOPEKA (AP) — A proposed severance tax on mineral production may take a big step toward passage Wednesday according to Rep. James Braden, chairman of the House Assessment and Taxation Committee.

Braden (R-Wakefield) predicted Tuesday that there will be a severance tax proposal moved out of the committee — possibly as early as Wednesday afternoon — if all goes as planned.

The House Assessment and Taxation Committee is charged with reviewing four controversial severance tax proposals introduced this session in the House.

"Hang loose," Braden cautioned committee members Tuesday afternoon. "We're trying to get something worked out, and it just might come up tomorrow."

Braden would not reveal specific points of the compromise.

"There'll be a compromise, but it won't be like any of the bills we saw," Braden said. "It will probably be parts of all of them."

Committee hearings two weeks ago on the severance proposals drew spirited debate between proponents in state government and oil and gas industry lobbyists.

The severance proposals vary, but basically they would tax oil and gas production, increase the motor fuels tax, and channel the increased revenues into property tax relief and highway funding.

Braden warned the panel to come prepared Wednesday, hoping to avoid problems the committee faced two weeks ago when it considered action of a classification amendment and reappraisal proposal.

Braden said at the time that committee members had not done their homework and couldn't discuss the proposals intelligently. He also said Tuesday he hopes the compromise will move quickly through the committee.

"If everything works out it may be a very dull meeting," Braden said. "At least I hope it will be."

Class learns seafaring on dry land of Kansas

By JULIE MAH
Collegian Reporter

The pungent sea air accompanying the gentle, swaying rhythm of a boat at sea. Could this be possible in land-locked Kansas?

For students enrolled in "Seafaring and Society," it isn't difficult to imagine sailing across the wide blue seas.

The course, offered under Special Topics in Anthropology, is taught by Marty Ottenheimer, associate professor of sociology and anthropology.

According to Ottenheimer, the class teaches the basics of all aspects of seafaring, characteristics of the sea, what seafarers have to contend with, characteristics of ship and social aspects. Unfortunately, he said, the class does not go sailing.

"Seafaring is the technology of knowing where you're going," Ottenheimer said. "You have to know the sea. Seafaring includes making a livelihood, it has a purpose."

OTTENHEIMER SAID his interest in seafaring began in 1967 when he visited the Comoro Islands in the Indian Ocean as a cultural athropologist. In 1969, he returned to the United States and has been conducting seafaring research since.

"They (Comorians) had an ancient tradition of seafaring," he said.

Ottenheimer said he attempted to "understand their way of life and what they're going through and to investigate the non-Western sailing ships' techniques."

When asked what he expected his students to know upon completing the course, he replied, "a student can get three things out of this class — what seafaring is about, the role seafaring has played in societies around the world and an appreciation of non-Western techniques and tradition."

The techniques in ancient seafaring are different and more successful, he said. Using the ancient techniques they were capable of crossing large areas of ocean.

OTTENHEIMER supplements his lectures with slides (of ships) he took while visiting the islands in the Indian Ocean.

He also utilizes model boats. One is a modern sailboat, complete with sails and rigging, which he uses to illustrate certain nautical terms.

The other is a "dhow," and was given to him by the Comorians. According to Ottenheimer, dhows were used "at least" 1,000 years ago and are still used today.

What motivates a student to enroll in this unusual class?

"Basically an interest in seafaring and nagivation," Tim McGrath, senior in biology, said. "You get a little bit of knowledge of navigation. You also learn the way people have navigated throughout the years."

An interest in archaeology and anthropology led Robert Beardsley, junior in social science and anthropology, to enroll in the class.

"It looked interesting," he said. "It's an excellent class, there is a lot of free initiative involved. Ottenheimer brings in models and slides and encourages questions. There is a lot of information and notes."

According to Beardsley, the Seafaring and Society class is definitely not the type of class where the student watches the clock and can't wait for class to be over.

"It's just the opposite," he said.

Financial aid forms due

With recent cutbacks in financial aid, application deadlines have become as important to students seeking aid as Friday-night dates to high school students. These deadlines have recently been announced by the office of financial aid.

The Higher Education Loan Program (HELP) of Kansas stipulates that all student loan applications be turned in by Feb. 26, and Kansas State Bank, 1010 Westloop, calls an end to applications March 12. All Missouri lenders have set a March 15 deadline, according to Bob Evans, director of financial assistance.

Anchor Savings and Loan, Junction City, has requested that students apply for loans by March 31. All other branches of the savings and loan have set a March 12 deadline.

Student financial aid lenders that distribute loans but are not listed above have not informed the financial assistance office of a deadline, Evans said.

For the 1982-83 academic year, financial assistance has set a March 15 deadline for Kansas student data forms and family financial statements.

Evans said the office has not yet received Guaranteed Student Loan (GSL) applications for the 1982-83 academic year, but when the GSL applications come in, students will be informed. The GSL deadline is April 1.

"I guess the important thing to communicate here is that we're talking about two academic years," Evans said. "Anybody who is seeking financial assistance for next year better make sure their financial aid application gets to us by March 15."

Senate to elect officers for upcoming year

Though the pomp and circumstance of a Washington innauguration will be absent, the 1982-83 Student Senate will swear in Bill Rogenmoser, junior in secondary science education, as Student Body President tonight. The event will officially begin the new term of office.

After the swearing in, senators will vote for senate chairman. Geri Greene, junior in journalism and mass communications was nominated for the position at the last senate meeting. Nominations have been open throughout the week and will be accepted until tonight's meeting.

When nominations have ceased each candidate will be given an opportunity to speak to the senat about his qualifications for the position. Senators will also be able to question candidates, Doug Dodds, senior in political science, said.

After the new chairman has been sworn in he will open nominations for senate vice chairman and student representative to Faculty Senate. Election of these officials will take place next week.

The duty of the vice chairman is to assume the duties of the chairman in the event that he cannot carry out his duties. The student representative to Faculty Senate acts as a liaison between the Faculty and Student Senate bodies and attends all Faculty Senate meetings.

Reflections of dance... Joann Ferguson, visiting dance instructor, keeps watch over students during a jazz dance workshop Wednesday in Ahearn Field House. The workshop was part of a week-long visit by Ferguson.

Visiting artist gives dancers sampling of jazz techniques

BY JULIE MAH
Collegian Reporter

As the music of Pablo Cruise echoes through the sun-lit room, the reflection of angling bodies is everywhere.

This is typical of the week Joann Ferguson has spent at K-State.

Ferguson, visiting guest artist from the University of Wisconsin, was invited by the dance department to teach dance classes this week.

Ferguson utilizes the Luigi technique for warming up the dancers. Luigi was a jazz teacher in New York who developed the technique after a car accident left him paralyzed from the neck down, she said.

"He was in the prime of his dancing career," Ferguson said, "and refused to believe his career was over. It's a way of using the muscles in a way that incorporates all the muscles at once, more or less. It's not an isolation technique where you just concentrate on the shoulder or arm.

"I use the Luigi technique for warm-up, but the combinations that I do are my own," she said.

COMBINATIONS ARE a series of steps which, when put together to counts, give the dancer a sense of a whole phrase of movement, according to Ferguson.

Ferguson received undergraduate and graduate degrees in dance from Southern Methodist University in Dallas, Texas. After graduating she remained on the faculty for two years before leaving to teach at Wisconsin. While at SMU, Ferguson also trained with the faculty and with visiting guest teachers.

"I've been to New York and studied with Luigi more than once," she said. "While I was in college, I also studied at the London Contemporary School of Dance.

"I am certainly influenced by Luigi and by modern dance," she said.

Though Ferguson has a hectic schedule, including visits to New York to attend workshops, she teaches classes regularly at Wisconsin.

"We (the faculty members) try to coordinate the schedule," she said. "As long as we're not gone all at the same time."

FERGUSON WENT to the University of Nebraska last semester and to the University of Iowa during Christmas break, she said.

A varied approach is used for the diverse classes she has taught, according to Ferguson.

"The warm-ups are the same, but I vary the combinations so that they learn how to do jazz in different ways," she said. "The music could be slow and lyrical or fast and rhythmic, percussive or nostalgic. They're all within the style of jazz."

Although K-State currently only offers beginning jazz as an elective, there will be beginning, intermediate and advanced classes as part of the curriculum next year, Ferguson said.

"Hopefully that should attract a lot of dancers to this area," she said. "For a dancer to go audition anywhere, you've got to have the versatile training that jazz offers. Basically the area that I concentrate in is jazz and modern dance.

"That's the kind of dancer I am, modern dance and jazz," she added.

Jazz dance can be danced to other forms of music, not just jazz itself, Ferguson said.

"I use everything from rock to blues and the more funky kind of music," she said.

Economic depression fears growing

WASHINGTON (AP) — Depression. That spine-chilling word, conjuring visions of bread lines, bank failures and apple peddlers, is surfacing more and more, triggered by serious concern that today's recession will slide into something far worse.

"Depression Fear Grows," reads an ominous Wall Street Journal headline. Democrats compare Ronald Reagan to Herbert Hoover. Some economists start to lay odds.

"I don't want to start a panic or alarm people...but I think there's a 30 percent chance of a depression occurring," Wall Street economist Edward Yardeni says matter-of-factly. If the economy does not start pulling out of its recession by May, Yardeni raises his odds of a depression to "50-50."

"This is a very atypical recession...financial pressures are growing and Washington policy makers are amazingly complacent about the problem," contends Yardeni, who is chief economist for the large brokerage house E.F. Hutton & Co.

YARDENI IS one of the most pessimistic forecasters, but he is starting to attract some company. Washington economist Michael Evans, who has a recent track record for optimism, now says there's a 1 in 5 chance of the recession turning into a depression.

"The key is interest rates," says Evans, who predicted a year ago that President Reagan's economic policies would spur an economic boom by now.

If rates come down, as Evans and most economists think is the most likely propsect, the economy will begin improving later this year. If not, adds Evans, high interest rates could trigger "a mass of bankruptcies and lead us into a depression."

OTHER ECONOMISTS refuse to say "depression" because people immediately think of the Great Depression of the 1930s, which is too harsh a parallel for the problems the American economy faces in the 1980s.

"The word depression is unfortunate; it's doesn't appropriately describe the current prospects for the economy," says Allen Sinai, a senior economist with Data Resources Inc. in Lexington, Mass. "At the same time, the problem should not be minimized."

"If the present course...isn't altered, we are running the risk of a major collapse sometime within the next year," he said, adding that nothing as severe has occurred since World War II.

A 1980s-style depression, most economists agree, would be characterized by an unemployment rate of more than 10 percent for a year or more, a string of business and financial failures and a long-term slide in output and personal income.

FEARS OF a deteriorating situation stem from the fact that interest rates have stayed very high despite a decline in the inflation rate and a softening economy. Economists worry that peristent fears on Wall Street about record federal budget deficits will keep interest rates high at a time when the Federal Reserve Board is trying to limit the growth of money and credit to fight inflation.

If interest rates stay higher much longer, many businesses will default on their outstanding loans and go bankrupt, lenders will start refusing to extend new credit, and a financial panic might set in, according to the gloomy scenario.

The president and his advisers continue to predict that their economic program will bring down interest rates and put the economy on the path toward long-term, healthy growth without inflation sometime this year.

"We still feel confident that interest rates can come down. There's no reason to be less optimistic about what the program can achieve," said one administration economist, who did not want his name used.

Album has fresh approach with all-keyboard material

By KENT HERMES
Collegian Reviewer

While thousands of rockers remain true to the mighty Les Paul and blast away with guitars ablazing, some musicians are consumed with exploring the vast possibilities of computer-keyboard compositions.

LEAGUE

DARE

Pioneers Gary Wright, Gino Vannelli, Kraftwerk and Gary Numan are just a few of the artists who have produced quality music relying on a keyboard's variety.

Even though the blitz movement is viewed as cold, calculated and aesthetically as shallow as a soap dish, it has created a new breed of musical technician. Ultravox, Spandau Ballet and The Yellow Magic Orchestra and many newer groups have gone beyond the bass-two-guitar-and-drums mentality.

The Human League uses an all-keyboard approach with interesting results. Soft textures mixed with sharp, dissonant passages combine to create an eerie yet sometimes light effect.

DARE, as a whole, rarely strays from a rigid beat structure and subdued tension. The lyrics are strategically placed with phrasing that seems strained at times. Emotionally numb turns quickly into dramatically neurotic. The lyrics range from blunt observations of relationships to vague descriptions of personal and metaphysical impressions.

"Darkness" is made up of loose ideas like, "I hear colours black and white, I see sounds that fill my head," and "Don't turn out the light or I'll go over the edge."

Most of the LP has a danceable feel, but it's still flattened with the constant bass pulse and techno-beats of computerized percussion. The material in general has more substance than many attempts made at non-guitar music. The special effects are fresh and positioned well with the other keyboard sequences.

Unlike sorry efforts that try to masquerade blandness as creativity, this album is worthy of time and consideration.

Little Apple: Trademarks intended to help visitors take a small slice of Manhattan to other places

When Manhattan was founded townspeople may have dreamed it would grow into a metropolis rivaling "the Big Apple." Today the only similarities between the two towns are the name and the apple.

Manhattan's Chamber of Commerce registered the trademark "Little Apple" for the city on Feb. 6, 1981.

The main reason for registration was "a lot of other cities use labels and logos — and so other towns couldn't use it," Wendy Schiappa, Chamber of Commerce public affairs director, said.

Registering the trademark cost the city $225, Schiappa said.

The trademark is legally registered to the Chamber of Commerce and any merchants who want to use it must talk to the chamber, she said.

"Merchants will be able to use it. The purpose of it (the trademark) is for information, advertising and any other manner that is a custom to trade," Schiappa said.

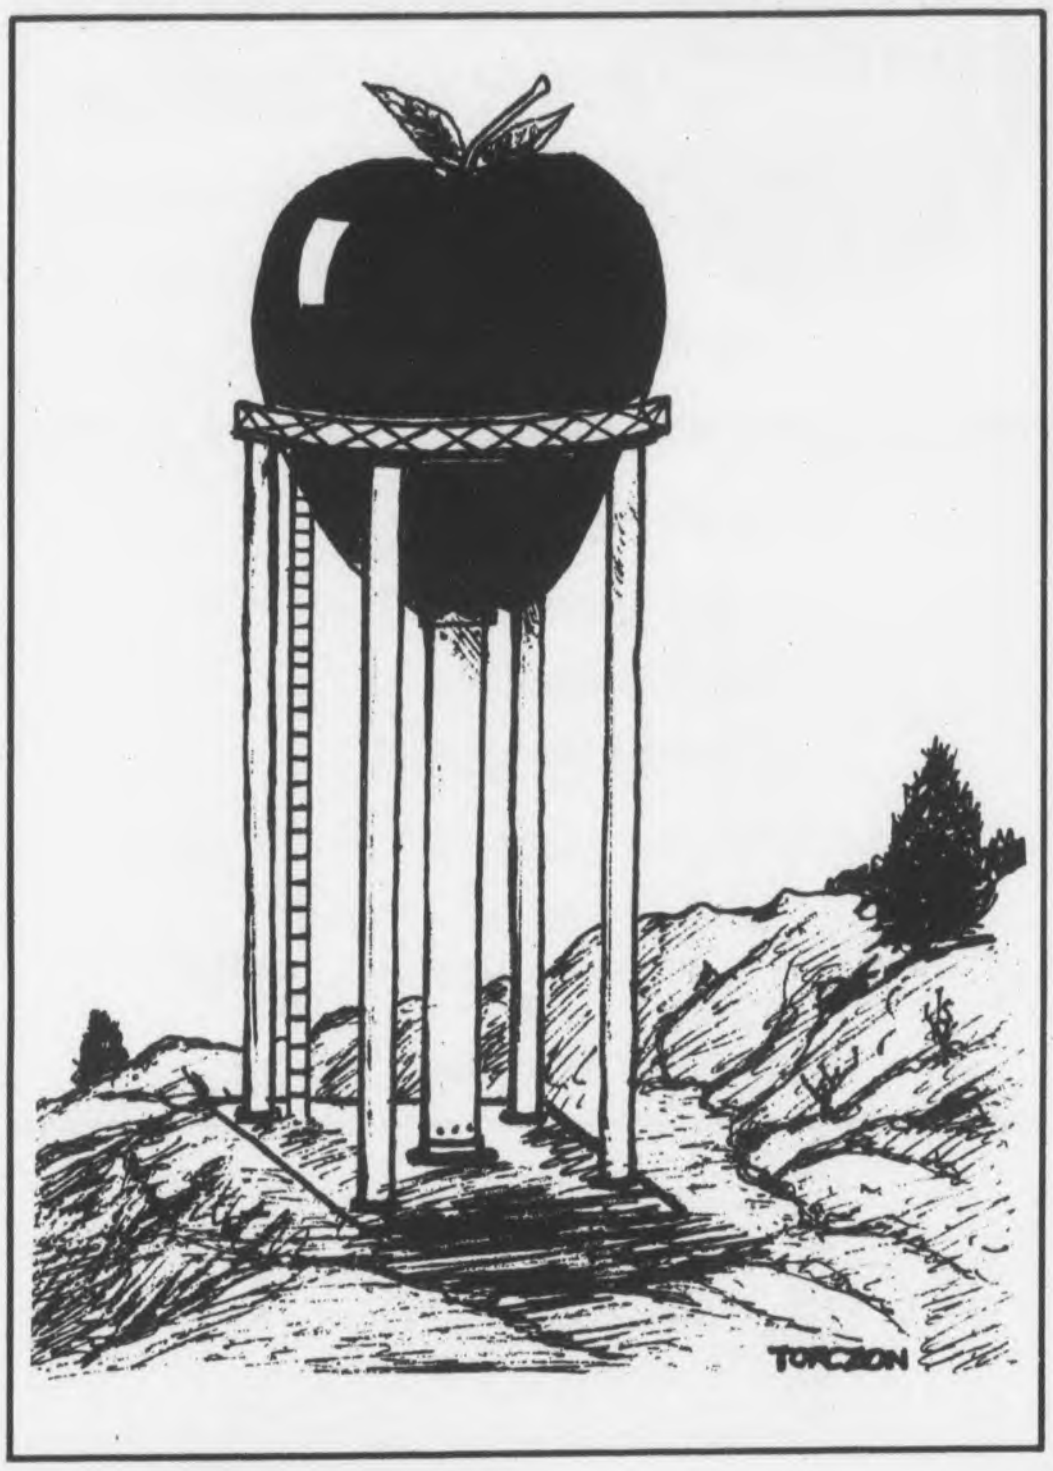
The Chamber of Commerce is "trying to encourage businesses to use the trademark and is using it in all their correspondence," she said.

Another reason for the trademark is to "help make Manhattan memorable because we want it to be remembered this way," Schiappa said.

"We put the trademark on pens and cloth patches to be passed out at conventions," said Lowell Jack, Chamber of Commerce chairman and convention committee member.

A large red apple will be painted on the water tower above Tuttle Creek Boulevard, according to Don Harmon, Manhattan city manager.

Businesses in Manhattan have different opinions about the effectiveness of the "Little Apple" trademark.



Tammi Larson, owner of Aggie Transfer & ETC., said she has "sold a lot of T-shirts with the Little Apple logo on them and they get a lot of compliments from people who see them, even if they don't buy one." Larson designed her own emblem which is a little different from the original designed by Holly Miller.

"A lot of the T-shirts are sold to people from out of town or for gifts. I know a guy from New Jersey who bought some to take back. He said the people thought they were funny," she said.

"I was one of the first to name my business (Little Apple) about a year and a half ago," Arnie Christensen, owner of Little Apple Music, said.

Christensen said he thought the trademark helped his business at first because it was "kind of cute and catchy," but now he gets tired of hearing it.

"It's not helping new businesses of th. people who started with it," he said.

Fibers may be key

K-State expert challenges evidence

By TANYA BRANSON
Staff Writer

A murder trial that has drawn attention to Atlanta, Ga., is thrusting the new technique of fiber analysis and a K-State professor to the forefront.

The scientific value of fiber analysis and its objectivity could be a factor in the jury decision as to the innocence or guilt of Wayne Williams, who is being charged with the murders of two black Atlanta youths, Nathaniel Cater and Jimmy Ray Payne. Cater and Payne are two of 28 youths murdered — murders that terrorized a city for 22 months and left the nation grief-stricken.

Randall Bresee, professor of clothing and textiles, is part of the team working in Williams' defense. The team, headed by attorney Alvin Binder, consists of many attorneys, detectives and experts.

Because of his studies on fiber identification from textile materials, Bresee was called last week to testify about fibers found on the victims. Bresee said he has researched fiber analysis for three and a half years and is one of few fibers experts in the nation.

ACCORDING TO a story by The Associated Press, Bresee challenged previous evidence submitted by the prosecution. The prosecution maintains that the fibers found on 12 victims matched those in Williams' home and car.

Bresee testified that some of the fibers offered as evidence matched carpets in the office of Mary Welcome, defense attourney, and fibers of carpet in Williams' home. Other fibers from Williams' bedspread matched material bought from a fabric store.

Bresee's testimony caused objections by prosecutors who questioned his accuracy and qualifications.

He said he testified that total accuracy in identifying the source of a fiber is not yet possible.

"We might be able to link a fiber to a person, and I'm real confident that we will soon in the future," Bresee said. "We are striving toward the ability to link fibers — evolving the hypothesis. But it cannot be demonstrated now and that's what I said on the stand."

FIBER IDENTIFICATION can be used to favor either the prosecution or the defense, depending on what the experts study, he said. In the Williams trial, each side focused on a different aspect of the fibers.

The prosecution submitted its fiber evidence a month before Bresee and "the fibers really strengthened the prosecution's case."

Bresee studied the fibers only for Williams' defense.

For example, he took a pillow case and dipped it in the Chattahoochee River where the bodies were found. Because he found similar fibers on the pillow case, he testified the river could be a source of the fibers instead of the prosecution's testimony which stated Williams was the source.

Bresee said if he had been on the prosecution's side, he "wouldn't have done it. I would have spent time analyzing a limited number of fibers."

EVEN IF HE had found a fiber that led to Williams' guilt, Bresee said he would not have voluteered the information to the court.

"It's the responsibility of the prosecution to find facts that he's guilty. It's not my job," he said.

The prosecution pointed out fibers that associated Williams to the victim, and were thus "incriminating to Wayne."

For the defense however, Bresee pointed out facts disputing the prosecution, but "if I was the prosecution I would use their evidence," he said.

"It's not up to me to decide (innocence) — that's up to the jury," Bresee said. "I push my side, the prosecution pushes theirs and a third party that is neutral can come to the truth."

How objective science is in a courtroom becomes a question when two experts are looking at the same evidence and are seeing two different things. Bresee said he discounts the belief that science is objective — particularly in a courtroom.

"You use science on which to base your case. The defense and the prosecution just base (their cases) on which side of science they are," he said.

SCIENTISTS AREN'T objective, Bresee said. They have biases when they start out and the biases show up at the end — biases showed up in the trial, he added.

In a criminal court the jury has to look at the evidence as if it came from a biased standard, Bresee said. Then it can look at the evidence objectively and make a decision, he said.

"The court looked at fiber weaknesses and looked at the strong points," he said. "You have to have an expert to look for strengths and weaknesses (in the fibers). Experts are intimately involved with it and can find the facts."

The court system is supposed to be set up well enough to sort through the facts and the biased evidence the experts give, he said.

"It's still facts involved," Bresee said. "If defense has a better fiber expert they can more easily punch holes in the prosecution's case, but if prosecution has a good case then the defense can't punch a hole."

THE FOLLOWING LIST OF KANSAS STATE UNIVERSITY STUDENTS AND OTHERS ARE IN SUPPORT OF AND AGREE WITH THE ARTICLE "I WAS THERE" BY JOHN MARKIEWICZ

Atlanta

"No I didn't, because I was not engaged in any type of contest or anything with them," Williams said. "I can't help it because they did a sorry job."

The defendant's outbursts were a contrast to his generally calm demeanor during his first two days on the witness stand.

Williams has pleaded innocent to murdering Nathaniel Cater, 27, and Jimmy Ray Payne, 21, two of 28 young blacks slain during a 22-month string of killings here.

NO ARRESTS have been made in the 26 other cases, but prosecutors contend the Cater and Payne deaths were part of a pattern that includes the slayings of 10 additional young blacks.

Defense lawyers called 65 witnesses in 15 days during the sensational trial, which is in its ninth week.

Prosecutors contend Williams threw the bodies of Cater and Payne off a Chattahoochee River bridge about a month apart last spring, but Williams told Mallard Wednesday: "Nobody said...they saw me stop on the bridge, nobody saw me throw anything off that bridge, nobody saw me kill anybody."

Mallard asked the defendant, tieless in a blue jacket and grey slacks, if his testimony had been programmed.

"No," Williams replied. "You want the real Wayne Williams? You got him right here."

WHEN MALLARD contended Williams used the term "dropshot" as a slur about poor young blacks, Williams retorted: "No sir. A dropshot can apply to anybody. And to be honest with you, you are a dropshot."

During another angry outburst by Williams, Mallard turned to District Attorney Lewis Slaton and smiled.

Williams later said he became angry because Mallard was taking his statements out of context "to get his point across."

Mallard told Williams there were inconsistencies between Williams' testimony and the stories he told police and reporters before his arrest last June.

After a series of questions about those inconsistencies, Williams asked Mallard, "What in the world has that got to do with killing somebody?...The question is did I kill anybody, and I done told this man (Mallard) I haven't."

MALLARD, REFERRING to interviews Williams gave to reporters before and after his arrest, suggested he enjoyed the publicity he received.

Williams said he did not want the publicity, and he charged that he gave a jailhouse interview to Us magazine last summer only on the advice of defense lawyer Mary Welcome.

"Ms. Welcome came to me and about that and said we needed to raise some income for the trial," Williams said.

Referring to statements in the Us interview, Mallard asked Williams if he had contempt for police.

"I sure did laugh at them, and I called them Keystone Kops because that's just what they acted like," Williams said.

He complained about police surveillance and, pointing to two FBI agents in the courtroom, called the agents "goons."

"These people have harassed me, you've harassed my parents, friends and everybody else, trying to put your little two bits worth of mess together, and I'm saying that, like anybody else, I got tired of it," Williams said.

Nealy trips Tigers

By HOWARD RICHMAN
Sports Writer

Ed Nealy hit two pressure free throws with five seconds left in the game as K-State upset fifth-ranked Missouri 57-56 Wednesday at Hearnes Center, Columbia, Mo.

K-State trailed 56-55 when Missouri's Jon Sundvold was fouled with 48 seconds left. Sundvold missed the front end of the one and one setting up the last-second heroics by Nealy. The Wildcats held the ball until Nealy was fouled on a layup sending him to the line for the game-winning free throws.

The situation was reminiscent of a similar game for Nealy as a freshman in 1979 when he stepped to the line in Lawrence and hit two free throws with one second left to beat Kansas 58-56. Nealy said thoughts of that game in 1979 did not enter his mind until he had already made the two shots to defeat the Tigers.

"There was a lot of crowd noise and I was just trying to concentrate on my shot," he said. "It's easier to make a two- shot foul than a one and one in a situation like that."

MARVIN "MOON" MCCRARY missed a desperation shot at the buzzer for the Tigers, giving the conference champions their second consecutive loss. Georgetown upended the Tigers 63-51 Saturday.

Nealy's free throws gave K-State its only lead of the second half. The 'Cats, now 9-4 in the Big Eight, led by two points twice in the first half of play.

Head Coach Jack Hartman was elated about the victory.

"It was a heck of a game and a great effort. Both teams played hard. Our team did a good job of keeping its poise. We felt confident with Nealy at the line. He has done it before for us," Hartman said.

The win avenges a 59-58 loss to the Tigers at Ahearn Field House Jan. 30. It also snaps a two-game Missouri winning streak against the Wildcats.

THE VICTORY also means K-State will receive a home-court berth in the first round of the Big Eight Post Season tourney which begins Tuesday. Missouri had already clinched a home-court advantage in the first round.

Missouri Head Coach Norm Stewart commented on the last-gasp effort by his squad.

"We had a set play at the end, but we didn't get the ball to the man we wanted to," Stewart said.

K-State, 19-6 overall, received 17 points each from Nealy and Tyrone Adams. Missouri, 12-2 in the league and 23-3 in all games, were paced by Steve Stipanovich's

Weightlifting puts gridders in top shape

By JOEL TORCZON
Collegian Reporter

"Unless you prepare yourselves for opportunities, your opportunities may make you look ridiculous."

A sign bearing this inscription hangs on the wall, among signs with similar inspirational quotes, overlooking a maze of metal and iron.

The scene is the football weightlifting room.

The clanging of iron, the sweating and grunting is now at its highest intensity as the Wildcat gridders are going through the routines of their off-season weightlifting and conditioning program.

Players and coaches indicate the program is a successful one, and all agree the backbone of the program is Strength and Conditioning Coach Russ Riederer.

Offensive Line Coach Jim Davie said Riederer is "super!"

"The kids are working hard for him and feel very good about it," Davie exclaimed when asked how he felt about Riederer and his program.

DAVIE NOTED the importance of the strength and conditioning coach having a good personality to run a successful program — something Riederer has.

According to Davie, Riederer's personality makes up for his lack of coaching experience. Riederer assumed full-time duties in May after serving as an interim strength and conditioning coach for Bill Allerheiligen who left to take a similar position at the University of Notre Dame in March.

Prior to that, he started as linebacker for K-State in 1977 and later served successive campaigns as assistant strength and conditioning coach and graduate assistant football coach.

"It's one of the best things to happen for K-State football," Davie said, continuing to praise Riederer's program. "Even if you get an experienced weightlifting coach from a school like Arizona State, he couldn't run a better program if the kids do not like him or would not work for him. The lads here like him (Riederer) and work hard for him."

ACCORDING TO Davie, the key to a successful conditioning program is to feel good about it.

"The kids here do feel good about it," he said. "They all have a good attitude and there is good chemistry between him (Riederer) and the kids."

Riederer said the program is designed to combine the components of lifting, agility, stretching and running to develop a totally conditioned athlete.

"Some weightlifting coaches handle only the lifting aspect," he said. "I combine them all into a process that will make an athlete totally conditioned."

The program, which is called a four-day split routine, is designed to include flexibility in its schedule, Riederer said.

"A player can chose any four days out of the week to do his lifting," he said. "That way, it can fit into his schedule."

Riederer said each two of the four days are revolved around two different types of weightlifting done alternately.

"The lifting on two of the days involves the chest, shoulders and arms; while the other two involve the legs, lower back and upper back," he said.

THE WEIGHTLIFTING scheduling can be set anytime from 6:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. except in the late afternoon on Monday, Wednesday and Friday when running is done in groups.

Running, which Riederer said is "very important in the conditioning process," consists of long-distance running, intervals (30-, 40-, 100- and 200-yard dashes) and agilities.

If a player opts to skip the workout, "We report their absence to the coaches," Riederer said. "They will then take care of it and decide what they have to do to make up for it."

Riederer also explained that if the player does not make up his absences, he will not be allowed to participate in spring football.

RIEDERER POINTED out that the success of the program is due largely to support of coaches and availability of fine facilities.

"I feel fortunate we have these facilities," he said. "Professional football scouts have told us we have one of the top eight weightlifting facilities in the nation.

The facilities include $150,000 worth of weightlifting equipment and the newly constructed Brandyberry Indoor Complex where all the running is done.

Darren Gale, junior in nuclear engineering, said Brandyberry has made a big difference in the running aspect of the program.

"Last year, all of our running was done outside in the cold and snow," he said. "Now we do our running at Brandyberry with more enthusiasm."

RIEDERER NOTED that there has been noticeable improvement in the player's condition.

"The players are bigger, stronger and faster," he said.

Jim Bob Morris, senior in business administration, supported Riederer's statement saying "I'm in the best physical shape of my life."

Riederer pointed out examples of strength improvement in Amos Donaldson, junior in social science and Will Cokeley, senior in business administration.

"When Amos came in, he could bench press 310 pounds," Riederer said. "Now he can bench press 440 pounds."

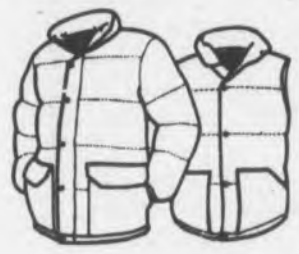
"Will was a junior college transfer who, at first could bench press 280 pounds and power-clean 250 pounds, but has improved that to 340 pounds in the bench press and 305 pounds in the power-clean," he said.

RIEDERER SAID the senior class is the first group to go through the weightlifting and conditioning program set by Jim Dickey when he was hired as head coach in 1978. Therefore, Riederer said the effects of the program "are just starting to show up."

He also credits the seniors for helping make the program a success so far this season.

"They are working very hard, setting good examples and showing good leadership," he said. "When the younger players see how hard the seniors work, it'll make them work hard too.

"The players are more mature this year," he continued. "They are setting goals for themselves and the team and working hard to achieve them."



Morris credits Riederer for making the players work harder to improve themselves.

"He is aggressive and assertive — he'll yell and scream at you, but he communicates and relates to you and does a good job running the program — I couldn't ask for anymore," he said.

Gale has high praise for Riederer too: "He has a great personality and has a lot of enthusiasm. We are getting down (on the conditioning) and are in good spirits."

Whether the program will be rewarded with a good season next fall or not, one thing is certain, Gale said. "We are enthusiatic and really looking forward to next year."

15 points. McCrary and Sundvold added nine points apiece for the Tigers.

Stipanovich managed only two second half points after pumping in 13 in the first half. McCrary did not score in the final half for Missouri. Nealy threw in 12 points in the last half for K-State.

MISSOURI'S RICKY FRAZIER scored just six points after coming into the contest with a 15-point average.

K-State shot 43.4 percent from the field while Missouri hit 48.9 percent of its shots. Missouri came into the game leading the conference in team field goal percentage with 53 percent. The Wildcats were second with a 52 percent average this season.

Nealy also collected 10 rebounds for the Wildcats. He was the Big Eight leader coming into the game with a 8.6 average. Reed and Craft each had six boards. Stipanovich had eight rebounds for Missouri. The 'Cats outrebounded the Tigers as a team, 30-27.

Missouri led 34-28 at halftime.

In the first half, Missouri built a 12-6 lead on a layup by Sundvold. Minutes later, Adams canned two charity tosses as K-State pulled within two, 14-12 with 11:45 to go. Adams tied the game 16-16 with a jumper at the nine minute mark.

THE TIGERS extended their lead after a Stipanovich stuff and free throw. Mark Dressler hit a jumper making the score 23-20. Stipanovich added two more buckets before the half's end to give the Tigers their six-point advantage.

The second half began successfully for Missouri when Sundvold lobbed an alleyoop pass to Frazier which ended in a slam dunk for the 6-foot-6 forward. But the Tigers tallied only one point, a Prince Bridges free throw, in the next six minutes as the 'Cats pulled within three, 39-36.

Frazier went to the bench after picking up his fourth foul with 11 minutes left in the game. Seconds later, Reed put in a jumper making the score 42-41 Missouri. Now it was K-State's turn to hit a dry spell as the Tigers surged ahead 48-43 with 5:55 left on the clock.

Missouri's Michael Walker calmly sank six free throws in a two-minute period as the Tigers led 52-47 with 4:30 to go. Baskets by Adams and Tim Jankovich rallied the 'Cats and cut the margin to 52-51.

SUNDVOLD HIT a bank shot to make the score 56-53. Nealy followed with a jumper, thus setting the scene for the last minute of play.

K-State will return to Manhattan and begin preparation for its last conference game Saturday against Nebraska in Ahearn Field House.

— have effectively organized programs related to those purposes.
— be following realistic plans to acquire the resources needed to have those programs.
— be well enough established so that it can be evaluated by an accreditation team.

HOYT AND MUGLER also learned of 13 additional specific requirements that a university must meet for accreditation, Hoyt said.

"After we returned we (the administration) established a self-study committee on the basis of the information we learned at the workshops," Hoyt said.

Mugler served as chairman of the committee which consisted of representatives from all the departments on campus, Hoyt said. The responsibility of the self-study committee was to develop a process to produce evidence of meeting the accreditation requirements, he said.

Hoyt and Burt Biles, assistant dean of graduate school, compiled a report of approximately 200 pages from reports made at unit levels and administrative levels, Hoyt said. The manuscript, he said, represented approximately 2,000 pages of material assembled by the self-study committee.

"The idea was to describe our programs, not to change them," Hoyt said.

"To my knowledge there have not been any earlier programs (at K-State) concerning accreditation," Koeppe said, "It's harder for private universities." He added that accreditation is "certainly not automatic" and a university may not be given the privilege of a 10-year span between evaluations.

"The purpose of the visit is to review the functioning and the degree of effectiveness to hich we are accomplishing," Acker said.

THE ART OF COMMUNICATION

I feel I owe it to all students to clarify a few things, so let's get the facts straight.

First, the ad, "I Was There" cost $60.00, was paid for by me, and will remain that way. I never asked to be reimbursed. (Collegian, Feb. 18 was in error.)

Secondly, a collection was started the morning the article appeared, by Gus Schmidt, sophomore in Construction Science, and totaled $41.00. When I learned of this, I approached Gus and suggested a table be set up to show the students' support of the issue.

Third, the signatures on the list show support only. This is not, was not, a petition. (Collegian, Feb. 19 was in error.)

Fourth, absolutely no one behind the table or on the list is against freedom of speech. We, too, will defend this constitutional right. Opportunists in the crowd decided to make an issue of word play.

I know that all the signatures collected agreed with "I was there." Therefore, the signatures are representative of support for that article alone. The Collegian's business office told me that legally and ethically that is all I can publish with the $202 collected. So be it.

However, the sign, "We, students of Kansas State University, oppose the distribution of anti-us materials on our campus" did cause quite a healthy stir. This sign, in plain view, was to be read in conjunction with the article, and many students understood exactly what I was trying to get across. Unfortunately, semantics reared its ugly head, and I grew to understand how politicians must feel when trying to get a complete view across with edited, limited media. Communications is so important. And that's the point!

We all believe in free speech—fair speech that is, not slanderous rhetoric. The distribution of the anti-U.S. materials I was referring to, is, according to the Iranians, solicited to inform us. The use of colorful language (Facism, Imperialism, down with the U.S. government, the U.S. must be punished) does very little to accomplish this; instead, we close our ears even more. Give us facts!

We continually hear about American aggression, but never Russian intervention. We walk into our Union each Friday and see a giant picture of the man who held 52 Americans hostage against international law, but never of the men that negotiated their release. We are told by these students that they are going to learn our technology to take back to their country to use against our government, and we question if we are talking to a future friend. We exercise our constitutional right to speak in the Union, and are boldly accused of being CIA agents. These students claim to be oppressed by being here, yet, we find them in their 6th or 7th year of a 4-year program throughout U.S. campuses.

I would like to pose one last question to the open-minded libérals that referred to my zeal for America as blind patriotism. If every country were to open their doors to all people, and these people were allowed to travel freely, where do you think they would flock to? Yes, our hands may be dirty, but they are a lot cleaner than most.

The opposition to the table told you students that you didn't know what you were signing. I will not belittle any of you. I'm certain you know how to read; and I believe I know what you felt when you signed.

"We're sick of all this crying. Be constructive in your criticism. Respect your rights as guests."

I give special thanks to my wife, Jill, Wally Domeyko, Darcy Lindstrom, Gus Schmidt, Chris Brault, Bob Roby and Dave Bowen for all their outstanding help.

For those who signed, I applaud you for having the courage to speak out.

For those who didn't sign, thank you for participating; good productive debate requires all parties.

I also thank the school officials for allowing this informal exchange of ideas. I admit it was heated at times, but at least you had enough faith in the students here to know they would work things out through Free Speech.

Report cites rods for Hyatt crash

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Kansas City hotel walkways which collapsed and killed 113 people last summer were designed to support less than a third of the weight capacity required by city codes, federal investigators said Thursday.

"This whole walkway (system) was inadequately designed," said Dr. Edward O. Pfrang, who headed the federal investigation by the National Bureau of Standards into the accident at the Hyatt Regency Hotel. The bureau released its findings in a 349-page report.

Neither the architects nor the engineering company involved in designing the structure would comment on the federal report.

The architecture was done by the firm of Patty, Berkebile, Nelson, Duncan, Monroe, Lefebvre, Architects Planners, Inc., of Kansas City. The engineering firm was Gillum-Colaco Structural Engineers of St. Louis.

IN EARLIER court documents, the architectural firm claimed the walkways were "safe, properly erected, properly inspected and properly and adequately supported."

The tragedy last July 17 was the most devastating structural collapse ever in the United States. In addition to those killed, more than 200 people, most of them attending an evening tea dance, were injured.

The federal investigation said the quality of workmanship and the materials used in the walkways were not to blame for the collapse. But it concluded the design of the support stucture was totally inadequate and could not even hold a third of the weight required for such a structure by Kansas City building codes.

TWO OF the three hotel walkways, all suspended by steel rods that hung from the hotel ceiling, collapsed — throwing steel, concrete and bodies onto the crowded hotel atrium where the tea dance was under way. Officials said about 63 people were believed to be on the two walkways.

Investigators said the walkways gave way when the hanging rods pulled through the box beams that connected the rods to the fourth floor walkway. That walkway then fell on top of the second floor walkway, causing both to plunge to the atrium floor.

The Bureau of Standards said city building codes required such a walkway to hold a total of 68,000 pounds, including the structure itself.

Furthermore, the report said, a decision during construction to change the design "further aggravated an already critical situation" since it placed additional stress on the six support beams that held up the fourth floor walkway.

PFRANG, CHIEF of the structural division at the standards bureau, said the original design also would have been far short of meeting city code standards, but in all probability would have prevented the July 17 disaster.

He declined to speculate why the design was changed, but acknowledged it made the structure easier to build and, thereby, less expensive.

No firm has acknowledged initiating the design change. Some have pointed the finger at each other in court documents related to lawsuits that have been filed in connection with the tragedy.

The original design approved by the city called for a single set of support rods to hang from the atrium ceiling and pass through the support beams of both the fourth-and second-floor walkways. The weight of each

Only a first glimpse... As soon as the fallen Hyatt Regency's skywalks were moved out of the hotel lobby, the search began for reasons behind the collapse. In a decision which could set a precedent, the Undergraduate Grievance Committee has overruled a department's policy and allowed a student to change instructors.

"It sets a precedent in the sense that a student's wishes shall be considered if it's humanly and physically possible," said Hermann Donnert, head of the grievance committee and professor of nuclear engineering, adding that if a similar case came before the grievance committee, the same decision will be made.

Robert Lytle, junior in construction science, filed a grievance against Richard Summerhill, head of the Department of Mathematics. He wanted to change his calculus recitation section, but a five-year-old policy prevented him. The policy "would not allow a student to change from one section of a course to another...unless there was a time conflict," Summerhill said.

LYTLE BEGAN climbing a chain of command that led to the Undergraduate Grievance Committee. In a letter to Donnert, he stated he had a problem in his recitation class.

"I am having trouble understanding my present recitation teacher because of a language barrier and the way he conveys material in the class ... I feel I am not discriminating against an instructor because I simply want the best education for myself by choosing a different teacher that I can understand better," Lytle said, adding that other students and the teacher were also having trouble in the recitation section.

"He (the teacher) couldn't understand the students. People in the class would ask a question three or four times and he didn't understand ... and finally they just give up." However, when asked in a phone interview if he understood the students in his class, the teacher said, "I understand."

After three weeks in the class, Lytle visited other recitation classes. "I found one where I liked the teacher. I liked the way he presented the material, and I could understand him," Lytle said.

The instructor, Tom Crice, graduate in statistics, thought it would be possible for Lytle to add his class, Lytle said.

LYTLE TALKED TO Summerhill who denied his request because of a policy designed "to keep the class sizes uniform. If you allow students to switch from one section to another section, what happens is one section will be very much larger than another section.

"Our classes are so large now that it is extremely difficult to teach them," Summerhill said. "You cannot do an effective job of teaching with 40 students in it (a Calculus I recitation class)." This

OCSA president resigns office after two weeks

Two weeks into his term and before conducting a single meeting, the president of the Off-Campus Student Association (OCSA) said he will resign from his position today.

Ron Bragdon, junior in life sciences, believes his resignation will be best for the 10,000 students he is representing.

"After I was elected, I just didn't have peace in my mind about it. I feel the other officers, Charles Knight for one, can do a better job of representing the students," Bragdon said.

"The other officers have more experience and with my lack of experience I'd be slowing them down. I feel they'll do a super job," Bragdon said.

Vice president Charles Knight, sophomore in industrial engineering, will assume Bragdon's position after his resignation is official.

The situation needs to get straightened out as soon as possible, Knight said, so OSCA can get organized for the spring semester.

"Ron's resignation shouldn't make a difference to the council since it's only two weeks into the term," said Dean Rossi, OCSA treasurer and freshman in natural resource management.

Referring to Knight, he said, "Charlie is well organized and knows what he's talking

Atlanta trial heads into final stages

ATLANTA (AP) — Testimony ended in Wayne Williams' murder trial Thursday after nine weeks and 197 witnesses, with his mother lamenting that the ordeal has "ruined" her family. The explosive case could go to the jury as early as Friday evening.

"Wayne's character has been drug through the mud," Faye Williams told jurors as she returned to the stand as a rebuttal witness for the defense. "My husband's character has been drug through the mud... The Williams family has been ruined.

"They continue to lie and lie and lie, but they have not produced evidence that my son is a killer," she said.

Superior Court Judge Clarence Cooper scheduled closing arguments for Friday after denying defense lawyer Alvin Binder's motion to dismiss the two murder charges against the 23-year-old black free-lance photographer and aspiring talent promoter.

"The most we've got in this murder case is speculation," Binder argued in his motion for a directed verdict of acquittal.

Cooper did not indicate whether he would place a time limit on closing arguments. The judge also did not say whether he would charge the jury immediately after the arguments.

Court spokesman Ken Boswell said each side will be allowed two hours to complete closing arguments and the case could go to the jury as early as Friday evening. He said jurors will deliberate in the courtroom rather than in a jury room because of the large number of bulky exhibits — including a bridge model and dozens and charts and maps.

When jurors do begin deliberations, they will be faced with deciding one of the most difficult and closely watched cases in recent U.S. criminal history.

Williams has pleaded innocent to charges that he murdered Nathaniel Cater, 27, and Jimmy Ray Payne, 21. They were two of the 28 young blacks slain in a 22-month string of killings that captured international attention before the slayings stopped last year.

No arrests have been made in the 26 other cases, but prosecutors contend the Cater and Payne deaths are part of a pattern of killings that includes 10 additional slayings of young blacks.

Prosecutors, who concede their case is circumstantial, produced experts who said fibers found on the bodies of the victims matched fibers taken from Williams' home and car. Other witnesses placed Williams with seven of the 12 victims and portrayed him as a homosexual with a violent temper who hated poor young blacks.

Defense witnesses depicted Williams as a man more concerned with helping young blacks than with his own success. The defense also questioned the reliability of prosecution witnesses, denied that Williams is a homosexual and presented fiber experts to dispute the state's fiber evidence.

Henry J. Ingram, a parking lot attendant and a prosecution rebuttal witness, testified Thursday that he saw Williams and his father fighting and that Mrs. Williams was present.

Mrs. Williams said she did not remember the incident. She also denied a teen-ager's testimony that her son had beaten her husband during an argument at their home in 1979.

Corrections

Wednesday's article covering Daniel Berrigan's speech incorrectly stated he said the last act of civil disobedience in 35 years occurred when eight individuals destroyed the nosecone of a nuclear weapons re-entry vehicle. In fact, Berrigan said the incident involving the eight individuals was the last act of nuclear disarmament in 35 years.

An article in Thursday's paper reported that Guaranteed Student Loan (GSL) deadline is Apr. 1. The article should have said the GSL application forms will arrive Apr. 1.

Senators surrender in busing battle

WASHINGTON — Senate liberals on Thursday surrendered in a nine-month battle to block legislation which would virtually elimínate the use of busing to desegregate schools.

Running out of help on the Senate floor, Sen. Lowell Weicker, (R-Conn.) agreed to call off a filibuster which had kept the Senate in session through Wednesday night and into the early morning hours Thursday.

A final vote on the tough antibusing legislation is scheduled for next Tuesday, and it is certain to pass.

Weicker gave in to a Senate majority which has repeatedly demonstrated its determination to curb the authority of the federal courts to order students transported across town to improve racial balance.

While getting help from a few Democratic liberals, he waged the battle almost single-handedly on the Senate floor.

Weicker still had 70 hours of debate time left when he agreed to quit. But after the Senate remained in session until 1:30 a.m. Thursday, Majority Leader Howard Baker vowed to pull out all the stops to close out the fight so that other issues could gt to the floor.

Carlin aide rejects GOP allegations

TOPEKA — A newsletter published by the Kansas Republican Party drew sharp criticism Thursday for its accusations that Gov. John Carlin accepted campaign contributions from construction companies under federal indictment on bid-rigging charges.

Bill Hoch, the governor's press secretary, rejected the newletter's report as "absurb and irresponsible."

"Kansans for Carin have not received one single penny from any construction firm since it was indicted," Hoch said of the governor's campaign organization.

"It very well may be that in 1979, 18 months before the investigations or indictments, that the govenor accepted money. At that time he had no reason not to."

Hoch said Carlin and the Department of Transportation had worked vigorously with federal investigators and the attorney general's office in prosecuting the bid-rigging cases.

Accused killer to undergo more tests

KANSAS CITY — A 31-year-old man accused of killing two people during a shooting spree in the University of Kansas Medical Center was declared mentally incompetent to stand trial Thursday.

Wyandotte County District Judge Leo J. Moroney ordered Bradley R. Boan of Kansas City, Kan., returned to the State Security Hospital at Larned for further evaluation. He requested a report within 90 days on the possibility that Boan could stand trial "in the foreseeable future."

Boan, who was evaluated at Larned after his arrest in December, is charged with two counts of first-degree murder for firing several shots from the medical center's emergency room March 20. He also faces three assault charges.

Dr. Marc Beck, 25, a second-year resident, and Ruth Rybolt, 54, who had taken her mother to the hospital for tests, were killed in the attack.

Gas may drop to $1 a gallon in price war

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — What was inconceivable a few years ago may be possible soon: a price war dropping gasoline to $1 a gallon.

The Kansas City Star reported in a price survey last month that a gallon of self-service regular gasoline cost an average of $1.152 per gallon in the Kansas City area. Full-service stations charged an average of $1.379 for regular.

Prices as low as $1.079 were posted for regular gasoline at some local dealers for both fullor self-service gasoline this week, and the Star reported one station selling self-service regular for $1.06.

"I think the service station owners are definitely keeping an eye on their brothers down the road. We could be approaching $1 a gallon," said Ed Stroesser of the Missouri Office of Energy.

Asner admits mistake in donation

LOS ANGELES — Screen Actors Guild President Ed Asner said today he made "a slight goof, an honest mistake" in the way he announced a controversial donation to Salvadoran rebels. He promised to clarify in future when he is acting as a private individual.

Asner, appearing subdued at an early-morning news conference, said he was under no pressure from the CBS television network, which carries his "Lou Grant" series, his production company, MTM Enterprises, or the SAG board.

A death threat against Asner has been received and a national boycott of "Lou Grant" has been threatened because of last week's announcement in Washington that Asner and other individuals were donating medical aid to guerrillas in El Salvador.

Suppression is grave threat

One of the most celebrated aspects of American life is guaranteed in the First Amendment of the Constitution — the freedom of speech.

This freedom is generally taken for granted by those who exercise it. However, recent campus events have brought it to the forefront. These events are, namely, the controversy created by a Collegian advertisement, "I Was There," placed by John Markiewicz in the February 16 Collegian, and by a table set up in the Union to gather signatures. Students were invited to sign a list in support of the statement, "We, students of Kansas State University, oppose the distribution of anti-U.S. materials on our campus."

Patriotism is admirable, but suppressing the flow of ideas, opinions or materials, including those which attack our own country, is a grave threat to the Constitutional rights of every American citizen.

Speed limit bill needs support

The Kansas House Transportation Committee has approved a bill which would raise the speed limit on certain state roads to 65 miles per hour. This measure would only take effect if the federal government repeals the current 55 mile per hour limit.

The bill also provides for stiffer penalties for persons convicted of speeding, and would eliminate the 10 mile per hour grace period now in effect.

Although similar bills have failed in the past, this one should be supported and enacted. Kansas has many miles of open roads, and transportation can only be improved with the higher limit.

Hearing ability is gift

Editor,

In response to Mr. Downing's idea of creating a group called "The Silencers," I'd like to congratulate him on taking a valid criticism and making it into a joke.

I will be the first to agree that unnecessary noise exists in "supposedly quiet" places to study. What should be done about these inconsiderate people? Should we go as far as posting guards, alias Silencers, around campus to collect fines? Let's be realistic.

Complaining about noisy people is one thing, but asking birds to sing somewhere else and requesting Fort Riley to alter their schedule, is going too far. These are just a few minor things everyone must learn to cope with as part of daily life in the city of Manhattan.

Mr. Downing, might I suggest you buy a pair of ear plugs, take two tranquilizers and try to realize the "world of noise" is something we must adapt to. Just think of the thousands of people who whould give up anything to be able to hear just five minutes of the world of sound; and the next time you start to complain, be thankful God gave you the ability to make the choice of listening to or shutting out these sounds. Some people aren't so lucky!

Musical afflictions: their symptoms, cures

They tend to sneak up on you, giving no advance warnings. "They" are the d.j.'s. I've suffered several severe bouts this week.

Perhaps I should say dee-jay's, because "they" are those uncontrolable urges to dump your entire record collection on the floor, pick out your favorite cut on each album side and blow the walls away.

A serious fit of the dee-jay's is always good for the soul but they can have adverse side effects. The dee-jay's tend to hit me early in the morning, while I am trying to physically and mentally prepare myself for a day "on campus." When the dee-jay's hit listening to an entire album side is literally impossible, you are compelled to flip records after every song and this entails a few gymnastic feats.

FOR THOSE OF YOU who have attempted applying mascara while the floor and walls of your apartment shake to J. Geil's "Till The Walls Come Tumbling Down" you have my empathy and sympathy. Brushing your teeth while changing and cleaning your favorite Ian Hunter album also takes plenty of practice. Crest does nothing to enhance the bass or treble tones relayed from a disc.

I also doubt if my neighbors enjoy these early morning rituals of music and dance. (You see, I can't iron clothes with out a musical accompaniment. Try some raunch'n'roll by the Pretenders or some pogoing Cars for wrinkle-free apparel.) I haven't had any complaints via banging on the walls or ceiling yet. Or perhaps any complaints have just blended into the bass beat.

SOMETIMES I get carried away and continue my fit of dee-jay's into class periods. I confess that I tend to prefer a good dose of the Keith Richard's guitar licks to classroom lectures. Perhaps if a professor or two started slinging Gibson guitars or Fender basses over their shoulders it would help ease the adjustment from earphones to classroom during my more prolific dee-jay's attacks. Or how about a few tight leather pants and skinny red ties?

The dee-jay's can also ht you while you're driving. They will force you to miss the campus parking lot entrance and drive from one end of the city to the other, continually turning the radio dial seeking audio satisfaction.

Even late night dee-jay fits are detrimental to any educational efforts. The Boss's lessons on life can override any attempts to read chapters one through four. Big Clarence and his sax tend to wail all night when rock'n'roll dee-jays hit. For you see, there are different degrees and categorie of dee-jay's.

ALTHOUGH MY record collection is relatively small it holds a wide range of music to please, and similarly offend, the ears of others. My record purchases have been called "eclectic" and "weird." It all sounds like music to me.

It was during a trip to Boulder, Colo. to see the Stones perform (Keith Richards actually. How can you not love such a sleazy looking, reformed junkie?) that I was informed my musical tastes were far from normal. The tape box contains a cassette labeled Kelly's Faves, sixty minutes of "eclectic" rock'n'roll. The Clash, The Who, Beatles and Bowie. Graham Parker, The Romantics, The Motels, Billy Joel and Springsteen. All music that's fit to hear, right? The other pair of ears in the car informed me that this was just plain weird stuff.

I LATER GATHERED that the meaning of weird was applicable to music not generally heard on Kansas City's major commercial FM stations. I think I'll stick to my weird music.

It's a good thing I didn't have an eight track in the car or the passenger would have been submitted to Jean Luc Ponte, Pat Metheny or some good ole Nat King Cole saloon ballads. (I have kept this treasured album hidden, along with my "West Side Story" soundtrack, after suffering verbal abuse when a guest spotted my album of Academy Award winning songs sung by Ole Blue Eyes.)

I'd also better not confess that I'm occasionally hit with the rythum, blues or soul dee-jay's, less I face total ostracism. They tend to make me listen and boogie (good heavens!) to Michael Jackson, Shalamar and Diana Ross.

I am not without my eardrum limits however. Nothing makes me move toward the television volume control faster than a commercial for a Conway Twitty album special.

The dee-jay's tend to leave me frustrated at times. My inadequate stereo equipment never does justice to the dumming of Led Zepplin or the bass of Bad Co. My incomplete record collection leaves a feverish fit of the dee-jay's unsatisfied and limp.

There is only one known cure for the dee-jay's and it is a temporary one at that, a roof-raisin', tush shakin', hand clappin', partyin' concert. Road trips excluded, it looks like I'll be suffering from the dee-jay's for some time to come.

Senate installs Rogenmoser; new chairman begins term

Bill Rogenmoser, junior in secondary science education, officially began his term as student body president last night after being sworn in at the Student Senate meeting. Geri Greene, junior in journalism and mass communications, was sworn in as the new senate chairman.

Greene, who was vice chairman for the last senate term, was the only person nominated for the position. The chairman is responsible for conducting senate meetings.

Nominations for senate vice chairman, Faculty Senate representative and parliamentarian were also taken. Final nominations and elections for these offices will take place at next week's meeting.

Those nominated for vice chairman were Jeff Dillon, sophomore in agricultural economics; Lisa Grigsby, sophomore in general; Jerry Katlin, junior in management; Gene Russell, junior in industrial engineering; and James Seymour, sophomore in mechanical engineering.

Greene said the vice chairman will replace her when she is absent and will be obligated to spend about 10 hours a week in the Student Governing Association office to be available to senators and to help her. The vice chairman will also do a special project on a chosen campus issue and present a report to senate, Greene said.

Those nominated for Faculty Senate representative were Kathy Houts, sophomore in elementary education and Jo Sheets, sophomore in general business administration. This representative serves as a liaison between Student and Faculty Senate.

McCain leads road lobby

TOPEKA (AP) — A spokesman for the Kansas Good Roads Association said Thursday the new organization does not intend to lobby the Legislature directly, but will through educational efforts try to make a stronger case for additional highway funding.

The organization, whose formation was announced at a statehouse news conference, is a broadly-based coalition of farm, civic, construction industry, labor and transportation groups.

Similar groups are active in 25 other states, including Missouri, and a national organization maintains a headquarters in Austin, Tex.

James A. McCain, former president of K-State and former secretary of the state Department of Human Resources, has served as chairman of the group in its organizational stage.

McCain said the organization's purpose is to "focus public attention upon the value of adequate road, street and highway systems to the economic life and developing" of Kansas.

House committee endorses severance tax compromise

TOPEKA (AP) — Championed as an "even better" compromise, a House committee endorsed a $103 million funding plan Thursday with a 3½ percent severance tax on the oil and natural gas production as it key element.

The measure, which now goes to the House floor for debate next week, also provides for a 2½ percent on natural gas liquids. It would generate about $103.2 million annually, with the money earmarked for public school finance to provide local property tax relief.

"I think it will pass the House easily," House Speaker Wendell Lady, (R-Overland Park), predicted soon after the bill's passage in the Assessment and Taxation Committee.

"It is a compromise package that's going to be good for the state of Kansas. It is a very positive step toward addressing the serious problems facing the state."

THE COMMITTEE, on a voice vote, overwhelmingly approved the proposal and recommended it be passed by the House. However, that came only after the plan was offered as a substitute to one of four severance tax proposals under consideration by the committee.

The amendment was a product of "considerable give and take over the last several weeks," Lady said at a news conference immediately after the committee acted.

He and House Minority Leader Fred Weaver, (D-Baxter Springs), were among the main figures involved in drafting the compromise bill.

It was offered in the committee by Rep. Robert Vancrum, (R-Overland Park), as a "reasonable blending" of the four severance tax bills in the house panel, which range from 2 percent to 7 percent taxes on oil and gas production.

THE SEVERANCE tax plan is designed to provide additional funding for public schools to prevent large property tax increases, but Lady said it should be viewed as one-half of a comprehensive compromise funding package.

The other half, unveiled by Lady at his news conference, would provide $73.1 million for highway maintenance.

The monies would come through a 2-cents-a-gallon increase in the state motor fuels tax and a transfer of revenue from the sales tax on new and use vehicles. The sales tax receipts now go to the state general fund, but would be channeled to the state highway fund.

The severance tax plan, hammered out during a two-hour meeting of the panel, would exempt all royalty interests and all wells with daily production of one barrels or less. A graduated exemption, based on depth of the well, applies those with two and three barrel daily production.

OTHER KEY provisions of the plan would:

—Rebate 5 percent of all severance tax money to counties with oil and gas production to districts to offset the loss of revenue caused by the erosion of their property tax bases. The money, estimated at $4.4 million annually, would be split between the counties and school districts in a county.

—Require another 20 percent of the revenue to be placed in a state trust fund each year with the money to be used later to replenish state aid to schools if severance tax collections decline. An estimated $20.6 million would be placed in the fund each year, with all interest added to the balance.

With money deducted for those two elements, the severance tax would provide about $78.2 million in new money for schools. Lady said that would be adequate to finance a three-year school funding bill passed by the House and sent to the Senate.

BOTH THE trust fund and rebate provisions were included in one or more of the House severance tax plans, and Lady they were added to make the final bill "even better."

During the House committee's discussions several attempts were made to amend the compromise proposal, but each failed. Several lawmakers, including Rep. Bill

Hyatt builders express relief after new report

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Firms that built the Kansas City Hyatt Regency Hotel walkways that collapsed said Thursday they were pleased by a federal report pinpointing the cause of the disaster as a design change, not faulty materials or workmanship.

Spokesmen for Havens Steel Co., the Kansas City steel fabricator that built the walkways, and Eldridge & Son Construction Co., the hotel's general contractor, said they believed their firms had been exonerated.

Gillum-Colaco, a St. Louis structural engineering firm that worked on the walkways, said it also was cleared by the findings, which were outlined in a lengthy Washington news conference Thursday.

"The presentation reaffirmed that the design of structural members (components) prepared by our firm did not contribute to the collapse," said Milton Bischof, Gillum-Colaco marketing director.

The architectural firm for the project, Patty Berkebile Nelson Duncan Monroe & Lefebvre Architects Planners Inc. of Kansas City, had no immediate comment on the report.

In court documents, however, PBNDML has said that, to the best of its knowledge, the walkways were "safe, properly erected, properly inspected and properly and adequately supported."

No firm has acknowledged initiating the design change. Some have pointed the finger at each other in court documents.

Following a seven-month investigation, the National Bureau of Standards announced Thursday that the design of the walkways did not meet Kansas City building code requirements and that a design change made before construction was primarily responsible for the collapse.

The report did not single out any company as having initiated the change in design.

Key city personnel who were involved in the review and approval of the hotel construction could not be reached.

Mayor Richard Berkley, who asked for the NBS investigation, and Crown Center Redevelopment Corp., which owns the hotel, said they were pleased the investigation had been completed.

"It is appropriate that an objective professional record is now available for study by interested parties," Berkley said. "I am hopeful the report will be used constructively and have a positive effect on future construction and design projects.

"We encourage all citizens to try their best to put this nightmarish tragedy behind them, secure in the knowledge that a very professional report has been made and that every means technically available will be taken to avoid future catastrophes," Berkley added.

"Crown Center is pleased that this important investigation has been completed," said William Johnson, spokesman for Crown Center Redevelopment. "It should have never happened, except for the gross indifference and disregard for known danger signs."

walkway thereby would pass directly to the rods, investigators said.

BUT THE report said a decision was made during construction to hang the fourth-floor walkway from one set of rods and then hang the second-floor walkway directly from the fourth-floor walkway.

That design caused the connecting beams on the fourth floor walkway to bear the weight of both walkways and "essentially doubled the load of the fourth floor connections" that tore lose on July 17, the report said.

Pfrang said the original design was approved by city authorities, who made "some changes" to the proposal, but did not grasp the fact that the design would be far short of meeting the strength standards required by the codes.

City officials were not required to approve the design change made after construction was begun and there was no indication the change was submitted to the city, Pfrang said.

KANSAS CITY officials involved in the approval of the designs could not be reached for comment on the federal findings.

The federal report gave no indication whether the architects and builders of the walkways were aware that their design fell so short of meeting strength requirements in the city codes. Pfrang said the investigators, who did not have subpoena power, were kept from seeing the structural design calculations used by the engineers.

Pfrang said the bureau asked all parties involved in building the hotel for a "laundry list" of documents and for the most part they complied. He said when the design calculations were requested, however, the investigators were told they could not be provided "due to the litigation" under way.

About $2 billion in lawsuits have been filed as a result of the walkway collapse.

Spokesmen for Havens Steel Co., the Kansas City steel fabricator that built the walkways, and Eldridge & Sons Construction Co., the hotel's general contractor, said they believed the federal report exonerated them in connection with the collapse.

MUSLIM STUDENTS ARE NOT ALL IRANIANS

In reference to the article of Mr. John Markiewicz which appeared in the Collegian of Feb. 16, 1982, Mr. Markiewicz addressed it wrongly to the Muslim Students Association. It is obvious that his comments were meant for the Iranian Muslim students.

The Muslim Students Association at K.S.U. consists of all Muslim students from various countries including the United States, in which the majority of the members are Nigerians, Malaysians, Pakistanis and Arabs. A distinction has to be made between our Association and the Persian Speaking Group (PSG). Iranian Muslim Students' views are not necessarily representative of all Muslim students.

The members of the Muslim Students Association at K.S.U. are concerned mainly with practicing Islam as a way of life according to the teachings of the Holy Qur'an and the tradition of the Prophet Muhammad—Allah's blessings and peace be upon him.

According to the five pillars of Islam, every Muslim is required to believe that there is one and only one God and that Muhammad is the last Prophet—Allah's blessings and peace be upon him, to offer daily prayers regularly, to give obligatory portion of his riches to the needy, to fast the month of Ramadan and to perform the Pilgrimage to the Sacred House in Mecca, if he or she can. In fact a Muslim dedicates all his deeds for the sake of Allah.

An integral part of a Muslim's faith is also to believe in all the previous Prophets and the Books revealed to them—Allah's blessings and peace be upon all of them.

Muslim students of K.S.U. are practicing their Islamic activities including Friday prayer and the Qur'anic studies in a rented apartment located at 307 North 16th Street (Islamic Center).

As such, I hope that whoever is concerned with Iranian Muslim students will not make improper use of the name of Muslim Students Association at K.S.U.

Ambassador hints of attack to stop PLO arms buildup

WASHINGTON (AP) — Israel's new ambassador hinted strongly Thursday that his nation may soon order a military strike into Southern Lebanon if there is no abatement of the arms buildup by Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) forces.

Moshe Arens told reporters the danger to Israel is "growing day by day" and "you might almost say it's a matter of time" before his government feels compelled to take "some action that would bring about casualties."

Such a development would be certain to exacerbate tensions throughout the region. President Reagan's special Mideast negotiator, Philip Habib, was dispatched to the area this week in another attempt to head off hostilities.

Arens, who just last week presented his credentials to Reagan as Israel's ambassador, stopped short of predicting a preemptive strike by Israel into Lebanon that could break the existing cease-fire, although he didn't rule it out.

He made clear, however, he believes there is a greater likelihood of a provocation by the PLO, such as shelling into Israel, that could ignite a retaliatory strike.

The only sure way to prevent such a conflict, he said, would be "to find some way to disarm the PLO."

Dean Fischer, the State Department spokesman, said Thursday that Washington hopes the parties in the region will continue to observe the cease-fire reached last July along the Israeli-Lebanon border.

Meanwhile, Egypt's U.S. ambassador, Ashraf Ghorbal, said following a meeting with Secretary of State Alexander Haig that they had discussed Lebanon and he had been told that Habib had arrived in the Mideast.

"I'm glad Habib is already there," Ghorbal said. "It speaks well for the determination of the United States to keep things cool and to have the cease-fire that has been achieved succeed. I hope that every effort will be made by all sides to respect the cease-fire."

Arens said the PLO is being supplied with heavy Soviet guns which are being paid for by Saudi Arabia. He said the the PLO and Syria now control virtually all of Lebanon except for the small portions run by Israeli-supported Christian elements.

Arens said Israel is losing its military advantage over its Arab neighbors, and said the United States is partly to blame because it is selling the most sophisticated weapons it has to countries like Saudi Arabia.

The loss of military advantage, Arens said, "is pushing Israel into a corner where it has no choice but to take preemptive action" if the trend continues.

While Israel doesn't oppose Washington's efforts to make other friends in the region, "We don't think selling arms is the best way of winning friends," Arens said. He said the United States, Soviet Union, France and Great Britain all are eagerly selling arms to the region in alarming quantities.

Polish committee vows to end era of Solidarity

WARSAW, Poland (AP) — The country's Communist leaders called Thursday for a crackdown on opposition and said expectations that martial law restrictions would be eased soon were "too optimistic," a party source said.

A high-ranking military official also said anti-state activity was now aimed toward Poland's armed forces, and he demanded a stop to these "perfidious actions."

The 200-member Central Committee was expected to approve the state of emergency declared Dec. 13 by party chief Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski. It appeared determined to end the era of the independent Solidarity union, returning Poland to a rigid socialist system practiced in other Soviet-bloc nations.

Jaruzelski, speaking to the committee Wednesday, blamed U.S. policy and internal opposition for slowing his timetable to ease martial law restrictions by the end of February.

"Martial law has failed to liquidate anti-socialist forces and people with backward views," said one party official who attended the congress but declined to be named. "Hence...motions for a quick rescinding of martial law should be considered too optimistic."

Supporting this view was political commissar of the air force, Gen. Edward Lukasik, who told the congress "increasing anti-state and anti-party attempts...at generating social unrest" were being aimed at the armed forces as well.

"We must firmly counteract these perfidious actions," he said.

Committee members were elected at last July's emergency party congress under pressure for reforms by Solidarity, and some members reportedly sympathized with the union's drive for demoqratic change in Poland.

The Central Committee is the policy-making body of the Communist party and under normal circumstances has supreme authority. The 14-man Politburo governs when the committee is not in session.

Roman Catholic bishops from across Poland also opened a two-day session of the church episcopate under primate Archbishop Jozef Glemp to draft their own policy statement on military rule in the predominantly Catholic nation.

The church has condemned military rule while urging restraint by Polish citizens and the government. More than 90 percent of Poland's 36 million people are Catholic.

about. I feel comfortable with him being president."

Linda Consigli, sophomore in general and OCSA secretary, said that Bragdon's resignation will not change the council. "We'll still get a lot done — we can take it from here, she said.

Knight has served on the off-campus council for two years and he knows what he's doing, Consigli said. "He's had a big voice in everything we've done so far this semester because he was here last year.

"I think Charlie will do a super job, he puts in a lot of extra time and he's a good leader. He accepts our input and makes us work together," Consigli said.

Bragdon's resignation will leave an open position on the council. Applications for this position will be available in the Student Governing Association office next week. The current council will hold interviews to fill the vacancy, Knight said.

Grievance

policy does not take into account whether a class is open or closed, Summerhill added.

Lytle said Summerhill asked him to go visit with the foreign instructor and to try harder to understand his accent. Lytle never visited with the instructor because he said he believed he had given the instructor a fair chance.

"I think that's (three weeks) ample enough time to understand the language and to understand the dialect of the man."

SUMMERHILL SAID other students even wanted to get into the foreign instructor's differential equations class because he was good.

After getting no results from Summerhill, Lytle wrote a letter to William Stamey, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

Stamey decided Lytle was asking for a change in policy and chose to uphold the department's policy. He also suggested that Lytle visit the instructor to try to overcome the problem.

"My main concern was that the mathematics department have a regular policy that they're following," Stamey said.

Lytle then went to visit William Feyerharm, the assistant provost.

FEYERHARM SAID grievances should be resolved at the college level and ultimately the grievance board.

A hearing was set for Sunday, Feb. 7. Three days before the hearing Lytle talked to Crice about getting into his night class.

On Friday, Crice went in to talk to Summerhill in an attempt to settle the issue without going to the grievance hearing. Summerhill turned down the request.

"If you change your policy for those who scream loudest, then it's not much of a policy," Summerhill said.

The grievance committee, consisting of two faculty members and two students, tied in its final vote. Donnert was left with the decision and voted in favor of Lytle.

Donnert said he wanted to accommodate students and give them the best learning experience possible. He added that students' wishes should be considered if there is an alternative.

"We don't make a policy. We just make a decision if there's a disagreement between faculty and students," Donnert said.

Severance

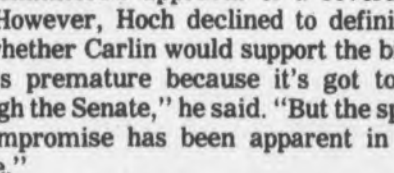
Fuller, (R-Miltonvale), finally voted against the measure because it did not include a provision for a sales tax increase.

Debate on the bill in the House is likely next Tuesday or Wednesday, and Lady predicted it would have no trouble.

But the Senate is "another question," he said, adding that senators should view the finance package as "an honest effort to reach a middle ground."

CARLIN, WHO is pushing a 5 percent severance tax and a 2 percent on coal, was told of the House compromise package Thursday morning during a meeting with Lady.



Bill Hoch, the governor's press secretary, said Carlin was "very enthusiastic" about the committee's approval of a severance tax. However, Hoch declined to definitely say whether Carlin would support the bill.

"It's premature because it's got to go through the Senate," he said. "But the spirit of compromise has been apparent in the House."

The Senate's taxation committee began deliberations Thursday on Carlin's 5 percent severance tax proposal, and accepted an amendment to earmark all of the money for school finance. However, the committee chairman has said no action will be taken until the House completes its work on the severance tax.

Bernard Franklin, appointed to the Board of Regents in 1976.
During his four years at K-State, Bernard Franklin accomplished many "firsts." He was the first Black to receive the Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial award all four years as an undergraduate.
In 1975, he became the first Black student body president and the first to win by a write-in campaign with 55% of the vote. This was the first in the history of the SGA general elections.
In 1976, Franklin at 24 became the youngest member ever appointed to the Kansas Board of Regents by Gov. Robert Bennett.
In 1981, Franklin was elected chairman of the Kansas Board of Regents and he held that post until he resigned in July, 1981.
Franklin moved to San Antonio, Texas where he now resides with his wife Loranda and 2-year old son Brandon.
Franklin was born and raised in Wichita, Kansas, and is the oldest of seven children.

Nealy makes All-Big Eight

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Ricky Frazier, Steve Stipanovich and Jon Sundvold, who led Missouri to a third straight conference championship and a two-week stint atop the national poll, were named to the first unit of the Associated Press 1981-82 all-Big Eight basketball team.

Frazier, Missouri's high-leaping, high-scoring senior forward, was selected to the first team on all but one ballot by a panel of writers and sportscasters.

Stipanovich, Missouri's 6-11 junior center, was named on all but three first-team ballots.

Joining Sundvold at guard is 5-9 senior Jack Moore of Nebraska, whose sparkling career destroyed the myth that only big men can play major college basketball.

Ed Nealy, Kansas State's career rebound leader, is the other forward.

MOST OBSERVERS agree that the Big Eight contains more quality players, from top to bottom, than it has in many years. And the balloting was close at several positions.

The second team consists of Oklahoma State's Leroy Combs at center, forwards David Magley of Kansas and Marvin "Moon" McCrary of Missouri, and guards Tyrone Adams of Kansas State and Chuck Barnett of Oklahoma, the Big Eight's leading scorer.

Frazier, a 6-6 native of Charleston, Mo., who transferred from St. Louis University three years ago, was a model of consistency all season. His first "off" game was probably the 17th of the season, when the Tigers, ranked No. 1 in the nation, squeaked past Kansas State by a point in Manhattan.

"I'll take 16 games out of 17 any time," quipped Coach Norm Stewart. "He is one of the best players in the country."

FRAZIER AVERAGED more than 15 points and six rebounds. His shooting percentage with one regular season game to go was .597, second only to McCrary's .638.

Stipanovich, one of the most highly sought prep centers in the nation three years ago, averaged almost eight rebounds and 11 points in Stewart's team-oriented concept.

Sundvold, a 6-2 junior, was Missouri's "zone buster," whose long-range bombs from the outside frequently forced opponents to come out of tight zone defenses. He averaged more than 12 points and hit almost 9-of-10 free throws.

Moore has been one of the deadliest free-throw shooters in the nation. This season, with two games to go, he had hit 110 of 118 tosses for a percentage of .932. Colorado Coach Tom Apke calls him "the most dominant small guard I've ever seen."

K-State's Jack Hartman was practically the only major college coach who paid any attention to Nealy four years ago when he came out of Bonner Springs High School. But as a freshman, the bulky 6-7 forward was voted the Big Eight's Newcomer of the Year, and he has put together an illustrious career. Heading into post-season play, he has 1,019 career rebounds.

Tim Lundberg bowls perfect 300 at Union

It what was just a typical league bowling night for most at the Union Recreation Area, Tim Lundberg, senior in journalism and mass communications, made it a Wednesday to remember as he bowled his first perfect game.

Lundberg's perfect game is only the second to be bowled in the 25-year history of K-State's alleys. Bill Woodard, Senior in secondary education, was the first. He rolled his 300-pinner in Dec. of 1980.

Since he was 13, Lundberg has dreamed has looked forward to that one night when everything was rolling right.

"It was very boring," Lundberg said. "Every ball was just right. But it wasn't boring for me."

As the strikes came rolling in, the attention grew steadily to Lundberg's lane, and when the last ball sped down the lane, there were about 15 spectators to give Lundberg a cheer.

"I screamed at my ball to carry, and when it did and I got my strike, I just threw up my arms," Lundberg said. "and I shook a lot of hands after that. Everybody was yelling."

That game was the first of a four game series in the 'Scratch League.' Lundberg's score in the final three games were 202, 200, and 179. His previous best was a 289.

Lundberg said the perfect game raised his average three pins to 192.

Track teams hit road to Nebraska in search of indoor championships

By TRACY ALLEN
Collegian Reporter

For the K-State men's and women's track squads, once again it's that time of season when school records and individual personal bests will be put on the line. The Wildcats, who won the KSU Quadrangular two weeks ago will have a couple of school records up for grabs Friday and Saturday as they travel to Lincoln, Neb. to compete in the annual Big Eight Indoor Track Championships.

In the championships last season, the 'Cats were impressive in both the men's and women's division as they finished in third and fourth place respectively. However, this year's meet is expected to be a little bit different as K-State will be trying to knock off men's defending champion Kansas and women's defending champion Nebraska.

ACCORDING TO Coach Steve Miller, the Wildcats are picked to finish in seventh place behind meet favorite Kansas while the women are expected to finish sixth behind powerhouse and meet favorite Nebraska.

"The meet overall seems to be fairly a solid one," Miller said. "All the teams in both the men's and women's divisions have a couple of outstanding athletes, and therefore should make it an exciting meet."

In the men's division, Miller singled out defending champions Mark Hanson of Kansas in the long jump, Ben Lucero of Missouri in the high jump, James Butler of Oklahoma State University in the 300 and 60 yard runs, Colorado's Mark Scrutton in the mile and Nebraska's Randy Brooks in the 60 yard high hurdles as people the 'Cats need to watch for.

LEADING THE WAY for K-State will be pole vaulter Doug Lytle. Lytle, who has been busy the past couple of weeks competing in the Millrose Games in New York and the KSU Quadrangular, is expected to bring attention to the meet this weekend as he will be out to try to defend his crown as well as trying to becme the first 18 foot pole vaulter in K-State history. In the Oklahoma City Invitational earlier this season, Lytle barely missed that mark as he jumped an all-time personal best of 17 feet-8.

Besides Lytle, K-State will also have sprinter Steve Wright, the mile relay team of Wright, Bill Tanner, Mike Bradley and Willie Major and long jumper Veryl Switzer helping out as well.

Switzer, who will be competing in both the long jump and 60 yard dash, expressed his excitement about the team's chances. "I feel we should do pretty good at the meet this weekend," he said. "Our quarter milers and sprinters are doing and excellent job as are our field event people."

SWITZER, who hopes to become the first 26-foot jumper in K-State history feels optimistic about his chances as well this weekend. "I expect to do well at the Big Eight," he said. "I'm hoping to jump at least 25 feet if not 26. But, I know I will have to work my tail off if expect to beat Ali and Wilhoit," he said. Switzer was referring to Missouri's Usef Ali and Kansas's Warren Wilhoit.

In the women's division, the 'Cats will have a much tougher time as they will be going up against one of the top women's track squads in the country, Nebraska. According to Coach Miller, the women who were picked to finish sixth might be a surprise this season.

"The way the teams are picked in this meet doesn't mean anything," he said. "I remember last season OSU was picked to win and Nebraska came out on top. Therefore, what the poll says has nothing to do with the way a team will perform for that particular meet," he said.

HOWEVER, MILLER was sure about one thing — and that is Nebraska's Merylyne Ottey. Ottey, who holds the world's record in the 60 and 300 yard runs is expected to be the most glamorous athlete in the entire meet. Ottey, who broke her own record in the 300 against K-State earlier this season is spoken of by Miller as one of the world's "premier" runners.

Besides Ottey, others who will be out to defend their crowns are Nebraska's Sharon Burrill in the high jump, Oklahoma's shot putter Cecil Hansen and distance runner Kelly Kathy in the mile.

For K-State, Miller sees half miler Deb Phil and long jumper Kelly Wenlock as providing balance for the 'Cats.

According to K-State middle distance runner Dana Schaulis, "As a whole, we are in the best shape we have ever been in all season," she said. "Our performances have improved tremendously throughout the season."

Schaulis pointed out that in five meets, the 'Cats have recorded up to 25 personal bests this season, something which possibly could be a major factor for them this weekend.

'Cats battle Cornhuskers

Coming off a stirring 57-56 upset over fifth-ranked Missouri, K-State will host Nebraska in a 2:10 p.m. tipoff Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats have nailed down second place in the conference and will play at home in the first round of the post-season tournament beginning Tuesday night.

The opponent will be the loser of the Iowa State at Kansas game also to be played Saturday.

The 'Huskers have already clinched a home berth for the first round of the Big Eight Tournament. A win over the 'Cats would assure them of a third place finish. If the Wildcats prevail, Nebraska will drop to fourth place.

The winner of the Oklahoma-Oklahoma State game will assume either the third or fourth place spot.

A victory over Nebraska would give Head Coach Jack Hartman and his squad their third straight 20-win season.

The 'Cats, 19-6 overall, defeated Nebraska 75-64 earlier in the season. In that contest, the Wildcats ripped the nets as they shot 77 percent for the game, a Big Eight record. In the first half the 'Cats hit 85 percent of their shots. Randy Reed pumped in 25 for the Wildcats in the contest.

Nebraska, 7-6 in the league, trounced Colorado 79-57 Wednesday night. The victory enabled the Cornhuskers to pull into a three-way tie for third place with Oklahoma and Oklahoma State.

All Nebraska needs is a win over K-State to clinch a home- court advantage on Tuesday. Oklahoma State will play at home against Oklahoma.

Randy Reed and Tyrone Adams are pacing the 'Cats with 14 points a game. As a team, the Wildcats are shooting almost 52 percent. Ed Nealy is leading the conference in rebounding with eight per game. Nealy hauled down 10 against Missouri.

Nebraska looks to floor general Jack Moore to direct the offense. The 5-foot-9 senior guard is the only Cornhusker scoring in double figures. The 'Huskers are also getting more production offensively from Terry Smith, 6-foot-6 junior center.

K-State has won the last four meetings between the schools and holds a 91-65 lead in the all-time series.

Women hit the road for Wichita State in search of their 23rd win, 14th in row

The women's basketball team, riding a 13-game winning streak, will visit Wichita State Saturday night to battle the Shockers. The Wildcats stand 22-5 on the season.

K-State defeated the University of Kansas 80-69 Tuesday night at Ahearn Field House. That same evening, Wichita State fell to another Big Eight school, Oklahoma State, 89-79. The Shockers own a record of 13-15 this season.

Lynn Hickey, K-State head coach, said the Shockers are worthy opponents despite their losing record.

"They are a very tough team to play on their home floor. They have a good combination of guards and big people in the middle," Hickey said. "Our big people will have to play better offensively."

Hickey also commented on the rankings which do not list K-State in the Top 20.

"I just think it's unfair. Teams in the Midwest don't get any recognition. A team in our location can't lose more than two games a year if they want to be ranked," she said.

K-State was ranked in December, but suffered four consecutive losses and dropped out of the poll.

The two teams met earlier this month and the Wildcats came out on top by five, 69-64. In that contest, Priscilla Gary paced the 'Cats with 20 points while Tammie Romstad pulled down 12 rebounds. Paula Stanley and Jackie Wilson led the Shockers with 13 points apiece.

In K-State's last two outings, Romstad has scored 48 points and shot 88 percent from the field.

Wichita State's Mary Kennedy, 6-foot-5 forward, is one of the top field goal percentage shooters in the National Collegiate Athletic Association. Earlier in the week, Kennedy was sixth in the nation with a 60.8 shooting average from the floor. The Shockers as a team were 11th in best shooting percentage.

Lisa Hodgson is the team's scoring leader with a 13 points per game average.

Gary leads the 'Cats in scoring with a 17 point average. She leads the team in steals with 65 on the season.

The series has been dominated by K-State. The Wildcats hold a 24-2 advantage in the meetings between the two teams.

Rugby Club starts spring season, will open against Pittsburgh State

By BILL MOROSCO
Collegian Reporter

The Rugby Club will be kicking off its 1982 spring season against Pittsburg at 1:30 p.m. Saturday.

This is the team's first regular spring season contest and a possible start to a repeat performance in the National Rugby Championship.

In the fall, the K-State club had a disappointing season, just below the .500 level with a record of 7-8. In contrast, the club made its way to the final four of the National Rugby Championships in the spring of 1981 by winning the Western Division Title, but was eliminated by champions from the Midwest and Pacific divisions.

The difference in the two seasons, besides the record, is that "in the fall season the club plays primarily non-collegiate teams, which normally possess a greater degree of experience and continuity, along with a substantial difference in age," Pete Lewis, who starts at the wing position, said. "The clubs also have a greater chance of getting sponsorship help from various organizations."

THIS SEASON, team members and coaches alike are looking forward to a winning season and more importantly, winning the Heart of America Tournament.

According to Head Coach Greg Young, "By winning the Heart of America tournament, it offers the winner a good chance at being invited to the National Collegiate Rugby Championships in Lawrence and a shot at a national title."

In pre-season play, the club lost to to the Kansas City Rugby Club, 4-0. The Kansas City Rugby Club is a team that will be on tour in Europe for approximately two weeks.

The K-State Rugby Club also held an intrasquad scrimmage with full contact and under actual game conditions, including the presence of an official.

According to Jim Hewitt, starting eighth man, "The intrasquad scrimmage is vital to rookies. It enables them to gain actual game experience and at the same time, it irons out any problems or questions that might arise."

BY HAVING A SCRIMMAGE, it allows the team and coaches to find out where their strengths and weaknesses lie. One of the team's strengths are the returning veterans. The team also possesses a couple of very promising rookies, including former K-State football player Jeff Meyers, a fullback.

"Meyers has adjusted rather well thus far. He is a quick learner and an even quicker runner. He is also very difficult to bring down — we really feel he'll be an asset to the team," Hewitt said.

Concerning the rookies in general, Hewitt said, "It's going to take a little time for them to learn the aspects of the game. Problems include leaving the ball on the ground after they have been tackled, being offsides and intentionally throwing the ball forward in order to gain an advantage."

The K-State Rugby Club has a great deal of experience in the coaching department. Young, the head coach, is a native of Ireland and a veteran player-coach for 18 years.

Lewis said, "Since he has played the back position for most of his career he has been able to instill his knowledge in that position to our own backs."

ONE OF YOUNG'S greatest contributions to the Rugby Club has been in developing a strong counterattacking capability by the backs, according to Lewis. "In this situation, the opposing team turns over the ball either by a kick or a tackle allowing K-State to quickly set-up a counter attack. This is primarily attributed to the speed, quickness and experience of the backs," he said.

Concerning the upcoming game with Pittsburg, Young said, "I really think we'll come away with a victory, but we are really looking down the road for the tournament to qualify for Nationals. This game will enable us to look at some of the new people and the other players who have switched positions. These next few games will help us settle the squad that will be playing in the Heart of America Intercollegiate tournament in Lawrence."

PITTSBURG IS "very enthusiastic and plays a very physical type of game," Young said, but lacks in the area of play execution and in their backfield.

The advantages that will be in K-State's favor are ball control, according to Young. "We feel that we will be able to run against them; we will be able to gain the forward yardage necessary. We also have a great deal of strength in the ruck and maul situations."

When asked whether the four-hour drive to Pittsburg will affect the athletes, Young said, "It's a slight disadvantage, but we have traveled a lot in the past so we're kind of used to it. We usually try to get to the other team's field at least an hour in advance in order to wind down and stretch out a bit. We also try to turn the trip into intervals as to make the trip physically easier on the athletes."

The K-State club's "spirit is high, and if the chemistry is right we should be able to repeat past history and come out on the winning end," Young said.

Williams linked to 24 other murders

ATLANTA (AP) — Investigators have evidence linking Wayne Williams to 26 of the 28 slayings of young blacks that cast a shadow over this city for more than two years, a source close to the case said Sunday.

And officials will meet this week to consider closing the books on most of the slayings and disbanding the task force that investigated them.

Williams, a 23-year-old black free-lance photographer and self-styled talent scout, was sentenced to two consecutive life terms Saturday night after a jury of eight blacks and four whites convicted him of murdering Nathaniel Cater and Jimmy Ray Payne.

A SOURCE close to the investigation, who asked not to be identified, said authorities had collected evidence to link Williams to as many as 24 victims in addition to Cater and Payne. The source declined to discuss the nature of the evidence.

The two not thought to be linked to Williams are the only female victims on the list — Latonya Wilson and Angel Lanier.

Williams, still maintaining his innocence, remained Sunday in an isolation cell at the Fulton County jail, where he has been held since his arrest and is likely to remain throughout appeals.

Sheriff Leroy Stynchcombe said under Georgia law Williams would be eligible for parole review in seven years "no matter if he had one life sentence or 50 life sentences."

DURING THE sensational nine-week trial, prosecutors presented witnesses, blood stains and fiber evidence linking Williams to 10 additional deaths in an attempt to prove a pattern to the slayings.

Defense lawyer Alvin Binder said the focus of Williams' probable appeal will be Superior Court Judge Clarence Cooper's decision to allow the presentation of the "pattern cases."

"We were put in a position where we were charged with two crimes and had to defend ourselves against 12," said defense attorney Mary Welcome.

Authorities from the seven police jurisdictions involved in the 22-month string of slayings will meet this week to decide the status of the remaining cases, said Robbie Hamrick of the Georgia Bureau of Investigation.

HAMRICK SAID Atlanta Public Safety Commissioner Lee Brown would have an announcement after the meeting about the pending cases. Brown could not be reached for comment Sunday.

The Atlanta Journal quoted unidentified officials as saying the task force will be disbanded and that Williams probably will never be indicted in the other cases.

The newspaper quoted Fulton County Police Chief Clinton Chafin as saying the 28 cases would be re-evaluated "to see which ones are definitely linked" by fiber evidence, physical characteristics, cause of death, and location of the bodies. Chafin severed Fulton County's involvement in the task force shortly after Williams' arrest.

The newspaper said police also intend to close the books on the slaying of John Harold Porter, who was never added to the list but was investigated by the task force. Porter was among the 10 uncharged cases that prosecutors contended were linked to Williams.

ASSISTANT FULTON County District Attorney Jack Mallard said there had been no discussion of additional charges against Williams. GBI Director Phil Peters said there are "just so many life sentences that can be given. I don't think anybody knows right now what will be done."

Jurors took only 12½ hours to deliberate after hearing from 197 witnesses and examining dozens of exhibits from both sides.

One juror, who asked not to be identified, said that at least three jurors believed Williams was innocent when deliberations began, but that unanimity was reached in the Cater case after 9½ hours, with the Payne verdict coming shortly thereafter.

ON SUNDAY, after their first night at home in eight weeks, most jurors would talk only about how the trial left them exhausted and emotionally drained.

"I woke up this morning with my head hurting so badly I have to go to the doctor," said one juror, who asked not to be identified. "I'm really exhausted from it, really tired. It's been a tremendous strain."

Prosecutors characterized Williams as a "mad dog killer" who, like Adolf Hitler, wiped out those he considered inferiors.

Blood donors meet quota

The amount of blood donated to the K-State bloodmobile fell short of the record achieved last semester, according to Laurie Green, student chairman for the bloodmobile and junior in predesign professions. There were 1,517 pints of blood donated this semester, 14 pints shy of last semester's record.

"The spring semester is usually slower than the fall semester for people giving blood," Green said.

The quota for blood donations is 1,200 pints per semester, 300 pints per day.

"Because K-State always meets their quota, all students, staff, faculty and their families are covered if they ever need blood. By covered, I mean that they receive blood free," Green said.

A traveling plaque is awarded to living groups with the largest percentage of residents donating blood.

Phi Gamma Delta fraternity had the largest percentage of residents participating, with a 100 percent turnout. The small residence hall winner was Smith Cooperative House with 64 percent, and Goodnow Hall won in the large residence hall category with an 11 percent turnout.

Caroline Peine, assistant dean of student development, was named the person who has contributed the most blood at K-State. Over the years Peine has donated four gallons of blood.

"I just feel an obligation to give blood," Peine said. "It doesn't cost me anything, and it gives somebody else life or health."

The bloodmobile visits K-State once each semester. Twelve organizations help organize the visits. Circle K, an international collegiate service organization, co-sponsors the event with the Red Cross, and coordinates campus volunteers.

Trend-setter in journalism dies at 84

The first woman in the United States to be named a full professor of journalism, Helen Hostetter, died early Friday morning at the Meadowlark Hills Health Care Center in Manhattan. She was 86.

Hostetter, a retired professor of journalism, was a pioneer in combining the study of home economics and journalism. While at K-State, she developed the home page course, which has required students since 1947 to edit a page for the city newspaper.

Hostetter earned a bachelor's degree from the University of Nebraska in English and from K-State in home economics. She held a master's degree in journalism from Northwestern University.

In 1926, she came to K-State to teach journalism, but two years later she accepted an offer to teach at Lingnan University in Canton, China. She spent three years in China before returning to Manhattan.

Free-lance writing, lobbying, editing home economic journals and co-writing a book were some of the accomplishments Hostetter achieved during her lifetime.

She was also a member of Kansas Press Women; Theta Sigma Phi, the national honorary and professional society for women in journalism; Phi Kappa Phi; the AAUP; and several other professional societies. She was listed in Who's Who in America.

Hostetter donated her body to the University of Kansas Medical Center.

Hijackers free hostages

STANSTED, England (AP) — Four armed hijackers peacefully surrendered a Tanzanian jetliner Sunday by sending two small children from their own families off the aircraft with their weapons, ending a three-day takeover.

Police said all 76 passengers and six crew members were "safe and well," although four passengers were taken to a hospital in shock. Police earlier had estimated there were 100 people on board.

Their ordeal began Friday in Tanzania when the hijackers, all in their early 20s and with their families in tow, commandeered the plane and forced it to fly to Kenya, Saudi Arabia, Greece and finally England. They were demanding the resignation of Tanzani's socialist President Julius Nyerere.

"We had no intention of making any concessions to encourage people to hijack aircraft," Essex Chief Constable Robert Bunyard told a news conference at Stansted airport, 30 miles northeast of London, where the plane arrived Saturday from Athens.

The end of the siege followed the release of groups of hostages throughout the afternoon. At that point, a Tanzanian boy and girl, both aged about 10, left the Tanzanian Airways Boeing 737 carrying weapons the skyjackers had used to seize the plane. Police said the children belonged to the hijackers' families.

The gunmen, waving white flags, then left the plane with their wives and other children and were taken into custody, police said. Each face charges under British anti-hijack laws and could receive life imprisonment.

Police were questioning the relatives of the hijackers to determine if they had any part in the takeover.

The hijackers had accused Nyerere of imposing intolerable conditions in their East African nation and demanded he quit.

British authorities said from the start they would not allow the plane to leave, while the sky pirates threatened to blow the craft up.

Police said the weapons were a loaded .38-caliber revolver, a fake pistol, a "wooden" grenade and a package labeled "explosives."

Once the plane was empty, police began searching for possible explosives on board and the airport remained sealed off.

The hijack ended 26 hours after the jetliner landed at Stansted Airport, where it was diverted from the busier London Heathrow.

The Essex police chief credited exiled Tanzanian ex-foreign minister Oscar Kambona, summoned at the hijackers' request, with helping to negotiate the peaceful conclusion. Tanzanian high commissioner in London, Amon J. Nsekela, provided further help, Bunyard said.

"It was decided it had gone on long enough and it was up to us to end it," said Bunyard, whose chain of command went up to a crisis committee at the Cabinet office and Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher herself.

During the five hours that preceded the end of the seizure at 5 p.m. — 11 a.m. CST — the hijackers released six passengers, then 17, then a co-pilot who had been injured at the start of the skyjack, then a batch of 41 and finally the last group of about 30. The hijackers had freed 10 passengers in Nairobi and Athens and two Saturday at Stansted.

The passengers were all believed to be Tanzanians and few spoke English. They were taken to the airport terminal to recover.

Dole wants minimum tax for high-income individuals

NEW YORK (AP) — Senate Finance Committee Chairman Bob Dole on Sunday called for a minimum tax on corporations and upper-income individuals to ease the economic burden on low-income families.

Dole, appearing on CBS News' "Face the Nation," said, "There is this perception that (Reagan) programs are impacting most severely on low-income Americans."

The perception is "to some degree accurate," said the Kansas Republican, and should be countered by a minimum tax on corporations and upper-income individuals.

"We believe everyone ought to contribute to economic recovery, even the rich," he said.

The non-partisan Congressional Budget Office reported Saturday that under President Reagan's economic program, families with incomes less than $20,000 next year will suffer an average net loss of $240.

But the agency said families with incomes more than $80,000 will show an average gain of $15,130 under the president's plan.

Dole also said the defense budget should be cut, partially since Reagan is president: "It's worth $10 (billion) or $20 billion (less) in defense just to have him rambling around the White House. His credibility is good with our allies, with the Soviets. He's worth a weapons system or two.

"We want Secretary (of Defense Caspar) Weinberger to get out his knife," he said.

Dole also said Republicans had to participate in efforts to trim the president's budget. "We can't tolerate $150 billion deficits, and that's what we're looking at," he said. "We must show the financial markets we're reducing the deficits."

He predicted that Congress would reduce cost-of-living increases for some entitlement programs, such as Social Security. "If we're really serious about bringing down deficits, not just posturing and making political speeches, we have to," he said.

"I don't think it's off limits," Dole said of Social Security.

Congress to review jailing registration dodgers

WASHINGTON — Congress will be asked this week to eliminate the possibility of jailing hundreds of thousands of young men who failed to meet Sunday's draft registration deadline.

Rep. Les Aspin, a member of the House Armed Services Committee, said he plans to introduce legislation this week that would make non-registration a misdemeanor carrying a maximum fine of $200 and no jail term.

Currently, failure to register within 30 days of one's 18th birthday is a felony punishable by up to five years in prison and a $10,000 fine. A grace period for an estimated 900,000 non-registrants born between 1960 and February 1964 to sign up without fear of prosecution expired Sunday.

Aspin (D-Wis.), said his bill would avoid making "martyrs" out of draft resisters and boost registration because judges would be less inclined to let violators off "scot free." If a draft is ordered, his bill would reimpose the stiffer penalties three weeks later, he said.

"It's one thing not to register...when that means evading the draft," he said. "It's something else to avoid registering when there is no prospect of a draft on the horizon."

Police charge widow with reckless driving

MIAMI BEACH, Fla. — An 80-year-old widow was charged with careless driving after her car swerved into a bus stop bench on a busy coastal highway, killing three elderly women and injuring five other people.

Witnesses said a Rolls Royce swerved in front of Gertrude Karmiol's car just before the accident Saturday, but police said she did not seem to remember anything as she sat in the emergency room of a hospital later.

"I don't think she realizes what is going on," traffic homicide investigator Charles Hayes said. "I think she's in shock."

Karmiol was charged with careless driving and allowed to return to her home.

Robert Delfin, 15, who saw the accident said a Rolls Royce cut in front of Karmiol's 1974 Chevrolet Caprice.

"She swerved and lost control," Delfin said. "The Rolls Royce didn't stop. The bench just went pouff!! and people were all over the ground."

Soviets discover survivors of capsized boat

AUCKLAND, New Zealand — Sixteen survivors of the capsized schooner Sofia were rescued Sunday by a Soviet trawler off the north coast of New Zealand, officials said. They had been afloat in life rafts for five days.

The report of the rescue was the first word that the schooner had been in trouble. Its captain, Evan Logan, reported by radio telephone that the Sofia capsized in heavy winds and that all but one person aboard was able to scramble into two life rafts.

The Sofia was en route from Nelson to Auckland for use in a film "Savage Island," about piracy in the South Seas.

Police arrest Carson for drunken driving

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — Entertainer Johnny Carson has been arrested for investigation of drunken driving, Beverly Hills police said Sunday.

The arrest took place "a couple of days ago, maybe Thursday or Friday morning" on La Cienega Boulevard south of Beverly Boulevard, said Sgt. John Carden.

However, he said he wasn't authorized to release any other details. He said he didn't know what time of day the arrest occurred.

Carson, host of NBC's "Tonight" show had a blood-alcohol level above .10 percent, the state measure for drunken driving, said Sgt. Tom Van Arsdale.

Delegates say bear grease forecasts weather

ANNAPOLIS — Two Maryland legislators think the National Weather Service could do a better job of forecasting, and they claim to have just the tool to do it — black bear grease.

The two delegates want to send the weather service at Baltimore-Washington International Airport a jar of bear grease as a signal of their dissatisfaction with the forecasts this winter.

If the Indians could use bear grease to accurately predict the weather 300 years ago, then the weather service should also give it a try, say Isaiah Dixon and Frank Conaway, two Baltimore Democrats.

When bear grease is poured into a jar and then sealed, it separates, causing a heavy layer of the thick grease to settle at the bottom. Patterns in the thickness and shape of this layer predict changes in the weather. When the grease is totally transparent, warm weather can be expected. Cloudy grease means cold weather.

Both Conaway and Dixon say they can promise bear grease would provide a higher forecasting accuracy than was achieved this past winter.

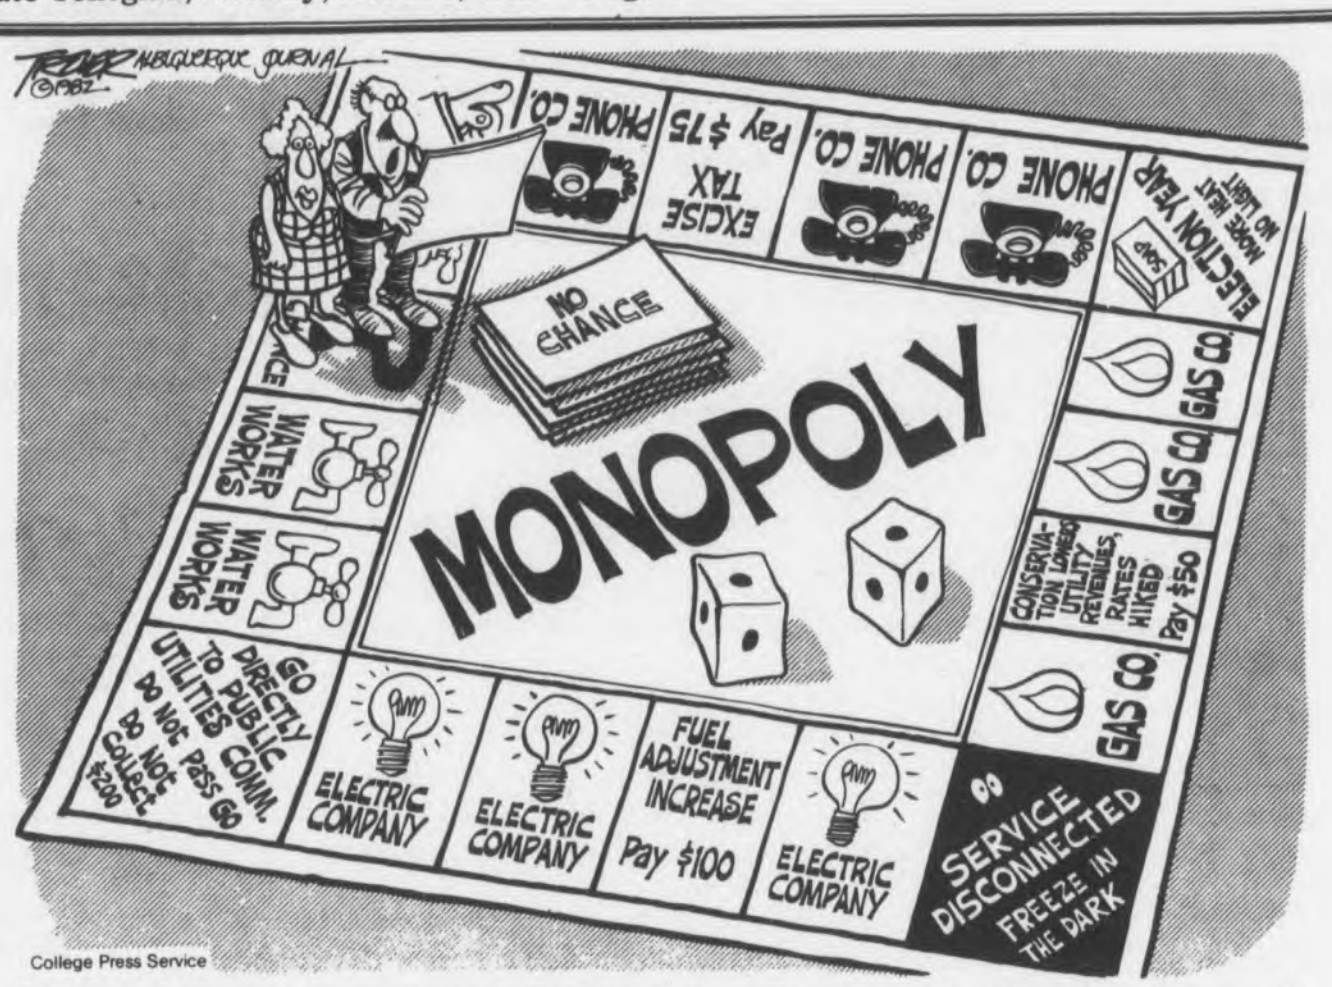
Blood program deserves thanks



Once again students, faculty and residents have succeeded in surpassing the Red Cross Regional Blood Program's quota for donations, a success which does more than simply change records or set future goals.

The simple, selfless act of donating a pint of blood is one of the few effective avenues a person in a non-medical occupation can take to save a life. It is an act which also provides life-saving blood for the donors and their immediate families.

While paying tuition fees can be painful, a few minutes spent reading the back of a K-State fee card can provide some enlightening, if not comforting, information. A fee card, which some view as a receipt for money misspent, "entitles the holder, spouse, dependent children, brothers, sisters and parents to receive blood without obligation for replacement at any location served by Red Cross or willing to accept shipments of blood from Red Cross."

Free blood, in effect, is a benefit presented to all students and relatives by a willing minority. Such a benefit should be appreciated more if it goes unused. Even a subconscious knowledge that it exists provides comfort. Thus it deserves a warm thanks from all eligible recipients to the donors, volunteers and Red Cross workers that make the K-State Bloodmobiles such a success — just in case.

Editor,

Darren Gale is an excellent contradiction to an age old stereotype. The stereotype I speak of is that of a football player. Not only is Darren a darn good football player but he's intelligent too. Yes, not every football player is "all brawn and no brains" as the saying goes. Some have both qualities.

K-State sould be proud to recognize Darren as the captain of the Big Eight Academic Squad with a 3.89 cummulative GPA in nuclear engineering. He was then selected as a member of the All-American Academic Squad.

I fail to understand why the Collegian did not and still has not felt this is a newsworthy item since its announcement last December. The item was however important enough to appear in the Manhattan Mercury, Kansas City Star and Times, even in a newspaper in Omaha, Nebraska.

I'd say something is lacking in a school newspaper that does not report the achievements bestowed on one of its students.

An 'A' in test taking equals a B.S. in degrees

Yes sir. Yes, I go to K-State. Yes sir, I'm a senior this year. What? No, I haven't got a job yet. You want me to take a what sir? Oh. I beg your pardon. I misunderstood. You want me to take a competency test.

Hey, I don't want to impress you or anything, but I am majoring in journalism and sociology. Finding out what I've learned in the past four years could take, well, an hour at least. Besides, I thought they only did that sort of thing for the students coming out of high school.

No? You've discovered that there are college seniors who still don't know the basics of math or English? They can't even read newspapers? Impossible! Why I bet you're going to tell me that they don't even know Walter Mondale is vice president of the United States.

Tell you what, why don't I just tell you about what I've learned at K-State. It might open your eyes to some new ideas — and if the news gets out, it might lower a couple of my grades. That's OK though, I know I can trust you not to tell.

IT'S TRUE, there are students who leave K-State with little more than the knowledge of which bars have what specials on what nights. They know enough mathematics to determine how much money they can save on two-fers, and how many drinks the savings will buy; and enough English to order properly.

Perhaps I'm being a bit harsh. The number of students who learn only about Aggieville specials is comparatively small. However, If you want my opinion mister, no one should be graduated from K-State with a degree in drinking.

To tell you the truth, I see a lot of students who are busting a gut (you thought I was going to say something else didn't you?) to get good grades and be graduated. I used to be one of them. Honestly though, that's not as important to me anymore — the grades I mean.

It must have been a year ago now, I came to the not-too-sudden realization that grades are not the be-all and end-all of my college career. Of course I prefer A's to D's, but I would rather have the knowledge to go with the grades.

YOU CAN FIND it anywhere. And mister, it's been around for a long time. Students have been working toward the almighty grade probably since children brought their pet dinosaurs for show-and-tell.

The system is something like this:
— Determine what test comes first.
— Cram for it.
— Take the test.
— Determine what test comes next....

The dialog continues.

Perhaps this is a most-skeptical view to take, but when I stopped taking classes for the grade and began taking them for the education, I became a much happier student.

There are always classes, however, where my new philosophy just won't work.

I guess you could call these my "classified" classes. These are the classes in which I am classified as an "A" or "B" student. (Of course you know I'd never be classified as less than a "B" student.)

BELIEVE IT MISTER, my English Composition II teacher had me pegged — no matter what I wrote, it was a "B" paper. I could have written "Clockwork Orange" and he would have given me a "B" with a notation that I should work on my theme development. In fact, one day I wrote a rotten composition, neglected to edit it and turned it in late. You guessed it, I got a "B." Ah, the life of a classified student.

All is not hopeless on a college campus though. I've had classes where I struggled to get a "B" because it meant as much as an "A" in most other classes. Try explaining to your parents that although you got a "B," it was really as good as an "A," and that they shouldn't be so concerned with the grade point average. I don't know about you, but "B" seems to spell "big deal" around my house.

FINALLY, there are the teachers who work with subjective grading. This means that students are sometimes subject to the whims of inconsistent instructors who take personal feelings into account when administering grades. This cheapens the all-powerful grading system to the point of becoming meaningless, and causes students to lose a shred of respect for the establishment.

Now mister, before you leave, let me clarify that I see a lot of good in the grading system. I realize that there has to be some sort of gauge of how students are progressing. It's just that with so many inconsistencies the gauge is often inaccurate. Students learn enough to get by on a test and forget it as soon as they lay down the pencil.

Oh well, if you'll excuse me, I've got to go cram for a competency test.

Poles ease travel ban restrictions

WARSAW, Poland (AP) — A domestic travel ban was eased Sunday by Poland's martial law rulers, but Poles must still obey an all-night curfew, submit to strict censorship and cannot leave the country, according to the official news agency PAP.

Interior Minister Gen. Czeslaw Kiszcak, the nation's chief law enforcer, also warned in an interview carried by PAP that the government will crack down hard on any new "acts of terrorism" and that dissidents who work against the Communist government's supreme authority may face deportation.

Polish radio also broadcast Roman Catholic bishops' call on authorities to resume talks with the independent Solidarity union, suspended when martial law was decreed Dec. 13 after 16 months of labor unrest. But the broadcast was a sharply edited version of the bishops' statement released Saturday, which also demanded an end to military rule.

Kiszcak said authorities felt successful in having "paralyzed leading structures of opposition forces and leading centers of counterrevolution." He said he knew the restrictions were painful on citizens, "but they are unavoidable and indispensible."

Kiszcak said authorities would consider opening international communications links this month. But his announcement did not lift an 11 p.m. to 5 a.m. curfew and other restrictions such a ban on foreign travel, holding passports and censorship of mail, telephones and newspapers.

The limited nature of the announcement was not considered surprising, since Premier Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski, the nation's martial law ruler, told Communist leaders last week that U.S. policies and internal resistance had slowed his schedule to lift martial law.

Jaruzelski was scheduled to meet Soviet leaders Monday in Moscow, his first visit to Poland's chief ally since he decreed martial law. The Kremlin welcomed the crackdown and the United States imposed economic on Poland and the Soviet Union in response.

The bishops' statement on martial law was read out during the regular Sunday broadcast of Mass, won by Solidarity after it formed during Gdansk shipyard strikes in August 1980. But the statement omitted strong church calls for releasing interned unionists and amnesty for those violating martial law.

A spokesman for the church said that the priest reading the bishops' statement had "to decide which part to read" because the entire statement was too long to be broadcast. He would not elaborate.

The government has not imposed severe restrictions against the influential church, which claims more than 90 percent of Poland's 36 million people as members. But authorities have warned priests not to use their pulpits to denounce military rule and priests have been reported detained.

Polish premier to ask for more Soviet aid

MOSCOW (AP) — Polish Premier Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski is expected to give Kremlin leaders welcome political news about the military crackdown in his country when he arrives here Monday. But East European and Western observers say he may also bring a tale of economic woe.

"The Kremlin is happy with Jaruzelski. He's done pretty much what the Soviet leadership wanted," said an East European source, referring to the Dec. 13 martial law declaration which suspended the independent Solidarity trade union and led to a purge of Poland's Communist Party.

Jaruzelski, visiting Moscow for the first time since he replaced Stanislaw Kania as party chief last October, is slated to meet with Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev and other top Kremlin leaders. The Soviets are likely to express concern about the economic strain Poland is putting on other members of the East European trading bloc.

"Jaruzelski will ask for aid to help keep the place under control," predicted a Western diplomat, adding that his official and unofficial Soviet contacts are already complaining, "How much longer are we going to have to help these people?"

Western bankers are also worried about Poland's economy, wondering whether Moscow will help Warsaw repay the $27 billion it owes Western creditors. The Soviet Union, troubled by poor harvests and falling industrial productivity, has reportedly sold large quantities of gold and sought additional Western loans to ease its own foreign currency crunch.

When Jaruzelski last visited the Soviet Union in August 1981, the Kremlin had already loaned Poland $3.5 billion, according to Polish reports. In January, the two nations signed a trade protocol calling for the Soviet Union to pump $3.86 billion more in goods and credits into the Polish economy this year.

While Soviet citizens grumble about giving aid to Poland, officials say privately that Jaruzelski found "the only possible political solution" to ending 17 months of social unrest that badly damaged the authority of Poland's Communist government.

Soviet media, which before mid-December warned of a "counter-revolutionary" plot to end socialism in Poland, now report on the "continuing normalization" of political and economic life there.

Strikes have ended and industrial production, according to Soviet reports, is reaching planned targets. A Western diplomat here interprets the shift in emphasis to a campaign "to drive Poland into the background." That effort has been accompanied by a campaign to accuse the West, especially the United States, of aggravating Poland's problems by imposing economic sanctions.

Jaruzelski comes to Moscow fresh from a meeting of the Polish party's policy-making central committee which fully endorsed the steps he has taken to restore order since Dec. 13.

Bid-riggers' night activities cost taxpayers during day

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Sometimes they would gather at a fashionable hotel or motel, men of success and reputation enjoying their prosperity.

There would be small talk and perhaps a social drink or two. Plans would be made for dinner. Maybe later in the evening there would be a poker game.

Nothing unusual — except that sometime during the night these businessmen would commit a crime that has cost taxpayers millions of dollars since 1977.

The men were in the business of paving roads. And they were helping their business by meeting to fix the bids on state and federal highway projects, according to a scenario described by Wayne Hundley, antitrust chief for the Kansas attorney general's office. He said there were a number of variations to the meetings in hotels and motels.

It's happened in at least 10 states across the country — including Kansas — in the past five years, the Department of Justice says.

And it has prompted the largest antitrust investigation in Justice Department history, an 18-state probe that has produced fines of $16.8 million and jail terms totaling over 18 years for guilty contractors.

MORE THAN 250 companies and individuals have been indicted by federal grand juries in the last two years for rigging construction bids on highways or airports. One hundred sixty of the defendants have pleaded guilty, 21 have been convicted and nine others have pleaded no contest. Four have been acquitted.

Rigged bids, officials say, can mean an increase of 6 to 10 percent in the cost of construction projects.

Most of the bid-rigging has been centered in the South, but there has been enough activity in Kansas to cause concern.

"We really don't know precisely how long it has gone on," Hundley said. "It almost seems like it...became a way of life for doing business."

In Kansas, 10 companies and 13 individuals have been indicted since April. In the only case to go to trial, both the company and its superintendent were convicted.

FIVE KANSAS COMPANIES and seven individuals have pleaded guilty. Three other cases are awaiting trial or no pleas have been entered yet.

The indicted companies, records show, accounted for more than 10 percent of the $679 million in federal, state, county and city contracts let from 1977 through 1980 in Kansas.

There is a five-year statute of limitation on the Justice Department probe, but state officials concede that bid-rigging has occurred longer than that in Kansas.

"I can't tell the full extent of it, but it appears it's not a recent phenomenom," said Dan Watkins, attorney for the Kansas Department of Transportation. "Some indications are that it may be less now than it was years ago. The pattern appears that when work is plentiful, there is more of a tendency to set work up. When work is scarce, the bids are more competitive."

How did it begin?

ACCORDING TO STATE LAW, a highway project automatically goes to the lowest bidder. In Kansas' case, officials say, there are signs contractors had access to state estimates of highway projects.

"I don't think anybody got any money for it," said state DOT Secretary John Kemp. "I think it was just a matter of answering questions, by bonding companies in particular."

A construction firm pays a percentage of a project's cost for bond protection. A bonding company would ask the DOT its estimate of a project in order to figure the bond cost; the construction company then could calculate the state's estimate from the cost of its bond.

Then that company and others might gather at a hotel or motel in Topeka the night before submitting bids and agree who would enter the low estimate.

BUT THERE were variations. And often the illegal agreement was more subtle.

"It might be a situation where one contractor is bidding on a project in his own county and he bids it hard, a competitive bid," said Hundley.

"And then some contractor who is hoping for a favor down the line contacts him and says, 'You are bidding for such and such a project, aren't you?'

"And the second contractor says, 'Well, I'm going to give you a complimentary or token bid on it. What's the number I should stay above?'

"Once the number is given, that makes it a colluded bid," he said.

SOME AIRPORTS have been involved in the national investigation, but most of the focus has been on highways. In Kansas, the indictments have almost exclusively concerned asphalt pavers.

One of the most active is Prairie States Construction Co. of Wichita, the only Kansas firm so far to challenge the government in court. Both the company and its superintendent, Edward Berry, were convicted of bid-rigging and mail fraud.

The firm, a subsidiary of the Omaha-based Peter Kiewit Sons' Inc., was fined $405,000; Berry was fined $10,000 and sentenced to a year and a day in prison.

Prairie States did about $9 milllion in business with the state from 1978 through 1980 on primarily small repaving projects but won't be doing much in the next three years. That's how long the company and Berry have been banned from bidding on federally funded projects. State DOT records show about 80 percent of Kansas highway work involves federal money.

THE WICHITA FIRM was the first indicted in Kansas for bidrigging, and the outcome of its trial has had a notable effect on ensuing cases, most of which have resulted in guilty pleas and offers of cooperation.

Officials with the Federal Highway Administration concede that cooperation with investigators is taken into account when the FHA considers banning a company from bidding on federally funded projects.

Arts and Sciences dean doubles as late-night piano entertainer

By DEE ANNE HEADLEY
Collegian Reporter

He plays intensely, his dark figure bending over the keys and swaying to the soft, melodic beat, lost in a private world. In the middle of a song he bursts out singing in a smooth, strong voice that makes the audience stop its chatter and gaze at him, pleasantly surprised.

The entertainer is Jack Carpenter, associate dean of Arts and Sciences. He has been playing the piano and flute at Ric's Cafe, a local club, for almost a year.

"I basically play background music," Carpenter said. "If you play background you don't have to worry about whether people are listening."

His act sometimes includes singing.

"I sing very little, just when the spirit moves me," he said. "Some songs just make me want to sing, others don't. It's just that some songs want to be sung instead of played."

Like his singing, Carpenter's act is unpredictable.

One night, during his act, he jumped up, lifted the top of the piano bench and pulled out a drink. Taking a sip, he walked restlessly over to the bar (flute in hand), sat down on a stool and began to play.

Dressed in black, Carpenter blended naturally with the simple, yet sophisticated, red, white and black decor of the restaurant.

"You can tell he likes what he's doing," said Marcia Vanderlip, a waitress at Ric's and senior in journalism and mass communciations. "There's a family atmosphere between Jack and the customers. He knows them and jokes with them."

CARPENTER PLAYS songs by artists such as George Gershwin, Kenny Rogers and Billy Joel.

"I do jazz and some standards," Carpenter said. "I'm not too interested in songs that are not likely to last very long."

He said he enjoys improvising on most of the songs, adding his own rhythms and interpretations of the music.

Carpenter doesn't take requests as part of his act.

"The main reason is that the audience is often likely to request bad songs (songs that he doesn't like) or ones that I don't know and I would play badly if I played them," he said.

Music has been a part of Carpenter's life since childhood.

"I started taking lessons when I was about 9 years old, just like all the other little kids," he said. "I was very serious about it (music) after about my sophomore year in high school. I didn't spend a lot of time on it, but I did stay with it."

At one time, Carpenter lived on Long Island, N.Y., where he played the saxophone in a 22-piece jazz band.

It was after he moved to Manhattan that he taught himself to play the flute.

"A couple of years ago the owners (of Ric's Cafe) asked me to play (at the club). I

Small claims courts offer justice at minimal costs

Consumer Corner

Editor's note: Consumer Corner is a project of the Consumer Relations Practicum class.

By Kim Hefley
Contributing Writer

So you feel ripped off again and your budget just doesn't allow for F. Lee Bailey to come to your defense. Don't give up — small claims court may be the answer.

A small claim is an action you can take for recovering money or personal property from a business or individual. The value must be $500 or less and you represent yourself in court. The person or business you are suing cannot have an attorney present either. Small claims court is designed to provide a speedy and inexpensive way to settle small disputes fairly.

Before you file a claim, try to work out the complaint. It is best to send the prospective defendant a warning letter. It should be concise and factual. State your claim, complete with dollar amounts, serial numbers and appropriate dates, along with what you expect to be paid.

Inform them of your intent to go to court if you do not receive satisfaction. Set a deadline for a reply, usually 10 days, and send the letter by certified mail. Keep a copy of the letter and the return receipt from mailing. This tactic may be all it takes to settle the matter.

The first step in filing a claim is to find the appropriate small claims court. The suit must be filed in the county where he actual transaction took place. You will have to give the defendant's complete legal name, address, a short description of your complaint and how much, in dollars, you are trying to recover. In Kansas, the filing fee is $5 and you may be reimbursed this fee from the defendant if you win. All court hearings must be held within 90 days after the claim is made.

Next, take time to carefully prepare your case. Gather all documents that are related to the case, such as contracts, warranties, recipts or repair estimates. Don't overlook other kinds of evidence, such as photographs or witnesses. You may subpoena witnesses, if necessary. Remember, the judge will make a decision based on the evidence you present. Make sure your reasons for filing are clear and well supported.

When the defendant is notified of the trial, he or she may be willing to settle the matter out of court. If you can draw up a suitable compromise, be positive the terms are completely written out, dated and signed. Keep a copy of the written agreement and notify the small claims court clerk.

The trial will be informal and short in duration. Watching a case before you appear will help you give a more effective presentation. Simply explain your case and stick with the necessary facts. Be prepared to answer any questions the judge may ask. The defendant will then present his side. If the defendant does not appear in court, you will automatically win. This happens in nearly half the cases. If you lose and are not satisfied with the decision, you have 10 days to appeal to the District Court. Both parties may have legal representation present in this court.

The court can also help recover the judgment by garnishment, discovery subpoena, or seizure of property. Don't bother to sue someone on Social Security or any public assistance. The court cannot make a person pay money they don't have and cannot attach Social Security on public assistance money.

Remember, this is your court. Use it if you have an honest claim against a business or person.

With flute in hand... Jack Carpenter, associate dean of arts and sciences, plays the flute at Ric's Cafe, a local club. He entertains his audience with flute, piano, and voice in a style he calls "background music." He has performed at the club on Sunday nights for the past year.

Carpenter

said 'no, I wasn't playing anymore,'" Carpenter said. "Last June they asked me again, and I said 'What the heck,' so I started playing on Sunday and Monday evenings. When school started, I cut down to just Sunday."

Vanderlip said, "I think Jack has a kind of cult following in this town. He always told me that if he ever stopped being a dean, he'd like to be a player in a lounge. That's his fantasy."

MUSIC HAS many facets for Carpenter, and it acts in his life in several ways, he said.

"Music gives me pleasure, whether I'm playing or listening to someone else play or listening to the radio," Carpenter said. "It gives me pleasure in an intellectual way as well as in an emotional one. Practicing is the intellectual part."

He often puts in a few minutes of practice time before breakfast and supper, and occasionally during his lunch hour.

"I try to work up a couple of new songs a week," he said.

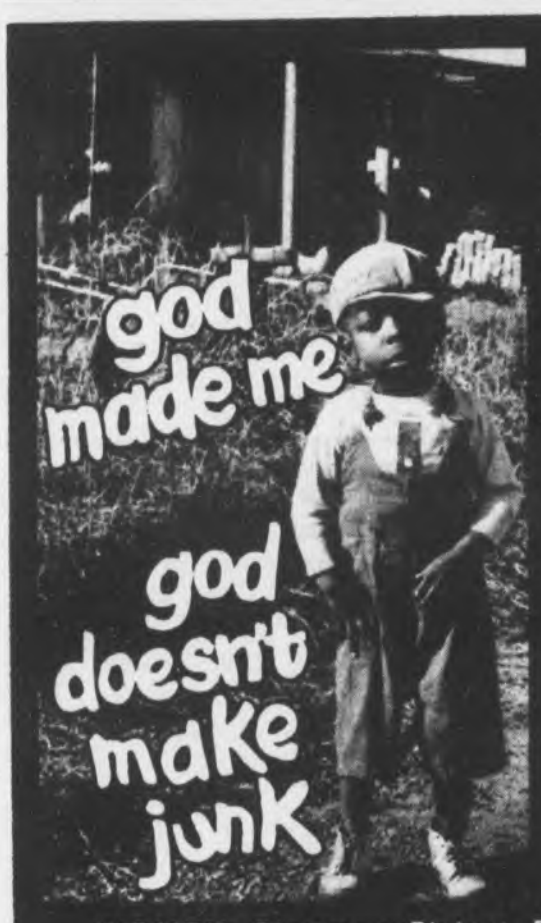
Carpenter uses his music as a channel for self discovery. He said that any artist wants to try new things, adding new dimensions to his craft as well as to himself.

"When I'm playing I'm really discovering myself," he said.

Part of the self discovery for Carpenter is creating various moods and effects in his music through his inner self.

"Music is filled with problems (with yourself and your range of skill) to be solved," he said. "The reason you don't play the same things over and over is because you see how many other problems there are. You develop your skills, tools and techniques, then try to think of a way to use those things to make music."

CARPENTER SAID he derives a sense of accomplishment and pride from his work.



"Sometimes I get a feeling of accomplishment. I want the feeling of doing something well that everyone else has been doing so-so," he said. "People who don't do their art or craft well don't care. They don't grow, they don't change, they don't learn new things."

According to Carpenter there is nothing unusual about a university administrator performing at a club.

"I'm me, whether I'm being a dean or playing or whatever," he said. "I've got energy and ideas, and I like to find ways to express them.

"It might be more incongruous here then at some other schools, but I'm sure there are other deans here who do something creative...," Carpenter said.

"Some students think that you've got a job and that's all you do," he said. They "...seem to think that you learn a job at college, but really you're learning to live."

Women active in African farming

Economist talks of ag extension

By KAY HUNTER
Collegian Reporter

The dump-on-top-and-trickle-down approach of spreading information to farmers in developing countries is ineffective because the information never reaches the growing number of women farmers, according to Emmy Simmons, agricultural economist and program and policy coordinator at the Agency for International Development (AID) in Washington.

Simmons has worked in Liberia and Nigeria and has done research on women's roles in agriculture in Africa.

Simmons spoke on "Teaching Women in Developing Countries: the Need for a new Model in Non-formal Education," Friday in Justin Hall before an audience of about 50.

Her speech highlighted a two-day meeting of the Women in Development (WID) Committee of the Mid-America International Agriculture Consortium (MIAC).

The Midwestern states are the food-raisers, so they are important in developing the type of farming systems where women are involved, according to Cornelia Butler Flora, sociologist and coordinator of the meeting.

ONE OF THE major deficiencies, Simmons said, in talking positively about WID is the statistics have been so incomplete that nobody knows what they mean.

"Ruth Dixon of the University of California, has put together some papers which plow through the official data of the developing countries," she said. "People share the general conclusion that yes, women do have major roles in farming, food processing, agribusiness, universities and the cottage," she said.

"There is less evidence to show exactly what the nature of the business is, how productive it is, what other alternatives there are and the rates of return," she added.

The woman's role in food production varies greatly from country to country, making it difficult to collect data, according to Simmons.

"In Liberia for example, women are responsible for upland rice (rice planted on dry land, not in paddies). Men help to cut down the forests, so it's considered a man's farm. After the forests are cut down and the rice is planted, the women refer to it as their farm.

"In households where there is more than one wife, many of the women have individual farms rather than working on joint farms with all the other wives," Simmons said. "So, it's really an individual women's farm in a very real and biblical sense."

IN MANY Asian countries, however, women's and men's food-producing roles are interwoven.

Besides food production, there are ethnic and religious variations among developing countries, according to Simmons.

"In analyzing a particular situation in gathering data, one must be aware of all the variations," she said.

The roles of men and women in developing countries are changing somewhat, Flora said. More men are earning salaries as construction workers or those who export commodities. These men leave the job of food production to women.

A profile on WID, written from research in the western African country of Mauritania, revealed frustration among farmers, Simmons said.

"The study looked into one area of rice and vegetable production. It turned out that people were terribly frustrated with the production level of the products, because there were no men working on them and women were not allowed to turn on the water taps," Simmons said.

"The men were in Europe earning money in Marseilles (France), leaving the women behind to guard the land. So, women played an important caretaker role for that land, but they sure as hell did not play a good productive role partly because they had no claims to any inputs of production," she said.

"They had no claim to water, or to extension because all the extension agents were men. They had no claims to seed or to fertilizer because they couldn't get credit. They didn't own the land. They were just sitting on the land," Simmons said.

MALE EXTENSION AGENTS are sometimes a barrier keeping female food producers from obtaining needed information about new agricultural technology, Flora said.

Because the traditional image of a farmer is that of being male, most agricultural agents will not consider talking to the women, Simmons said.

In some cultures, however, it is a taboo for a woman to speak to a man who is not her husband or kin, making it impossible for a male agricultural agent to talk to the women, she said.

There are some female extension agents available in some countries, but they usually are trained in homemaking skills and not in agricultural technology, according to Flora.

"In Kenya and Botswana, the male migration to urban mining jobs is very strong, leaving women as the backbone farm managers," Simmons said. "In these cases, people have said what you need to do is have women agricultural extension agents because there have been a number of studies showing women are not given an equal share of the informational resources. The information does not trickle across from the men to the women," she added.

One problem-solving approach to spreading the information in Tanzania has been to have a radio show, according to Simmons.

"They get groups of women together with a tape recorder to talk about their problems and what their priorities are," she said. "It took one facilitator, like a home economics extension agent or a sociologist, to sit down with these women to decide which problems deserve priority attention and what resources they need to address these problems," Simmons said.

IN BANGLADESH, there is a women's component in a male extension service.

"When they were teaching women farm skills, they had to give women a place to go where they would be guarded behind walls when they wanted to practice these new skills," Simmons said. "They could practice then and not be public." The women's component of the men's program became exclusively for women.

Implementation of such solutions has met with obstacles — biases and competition for limited resources, Simmons said.

"A lot of people have problems channeling resources to women to increase their agricultural productivity," Simmons said.

"I'm sure you've all heard it and I've heard it a million times that women don't want to work in agriculture," she said. "The whole purpose of agricultural development is to let women go back to their houses and take care of their kids.

"I'm sure you've heard that and you'll hear it for the next 20 years because it's a very strongly held feeling that agriculture is not appropriate for women. The sooner you get women out of agriculture, the better off everyone will be," she said.

"My own view and that of WID is that women are in agriculture. As long as they are in agriculture, they should be as productive as they possibly can be. If this means having women-only credit programs, fine! It should be up to the women to decide when they want to get out of agriculture, not up to the people who provide the resources or advice," Simmons said.

THERE HAVE been some institutional changes in attitudes, she said.

Farmer training sessions have been held where the wives learn about storage and processing, and their husbands learn other agricultural practices. However, the argument was raised at one project review meeting that men receive a plow or a bullock, something with which to practice new information on, while the women receive nothing but the knowledge, she said.

"We (AID) raised this issue and people agreed that it was right," Simmons said. "At least it wasn't a ho, ho, ho, who-cares-anyway attitude."

An aspect which has some bearing on the urgency of the problem of women in food production is that household incomes are divided in many developing countries.

"The husband and wife each know what they're responsible for," Simmons said. "The husband may be responsible for the money for food, while the wife's money will go toward putting the children through school. If the wife cannot earn enough money, then the children don't go to school," she said. "It's the children who suffer."

Israel hints it may ban visit by Egyptian chief

JERUSALEM (AP) — Israel said Sunday it might refuse to host Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak on an official visit unless he includes Jerusalem in his travel plans.

Cabinet Secretary Arieh Naor said if Mubarak "insists that Jerusalem will not be included in his visit, Israel should forego this important visit."

Prime Minister Menachem Begin did not attend the Cabinet meeting, instead meeting with a delegation of settlers from the occupied Sinai Peninsula who were angered over army roadblocks set up to prevent an influx of thousands of opponents to Israel's withdrawal from Sinai.

About 1,000 demonstrators gathered in Jerusalem to protest the Israeli withdrawal. The Cabinet, meanwhile, voted its support of the roadblocks, ordered by Defense Minister Ariel Sharon after hearing of plans for massive infiltrations of the area for demonstrations this week.

In Cairo, there was no immediate comment on the Israeli Cabinet statement. But Osama el Baz, undersecretary of the Foreign Ministry and director of Mubarak's political bureau, said the Egyptian administration would send a "number of messages" to Western countries, regarding "developments in the region." He said the United States in particular would be sent such a message, expected to deal with the Jerusalem dispute.

Mubarak is reluctant to go to Jerusalem because it may be interpreted a recognition of Israel's annexation of the Arab sector of the city.

Sources here said, however, that a compromise was under discussion for the Egyptian leader to briefly include the disputed Israeli capital in a wider itinerary.

Israel declared that area part of its undivided, "eternal capital" in August 1980, a move that caused the late Egyptian President Anwar Sadat to avoid meeting there with Begin. Sadat and Begin met in Haifa, and later in Sharm el Sheikh. Sadat had visited Jerusalem in 1977, before the official annexation.

Most countries, including the United States, do not recognize Jerusalem as the capital because it was designated as an international city under a 1947 United Nations resolution. Its status has never been clarified. The 1948 Arab-Israeli war, in which Israel captured the western half of the city, nullified the resolution for Israel. In the 1967 Middle East war, Israel took the eastern, Arab sector from Jordan.

Begin, meanwhile, told the settlers Sunday that access to the Sinai would be denied to non-residents until it is relinquished to Egypt on April 25. Tension was reported to be building among the settlers.

The right-wing Tehiya party, which wants Israel to back out of the peace treaty with Egypt, said it would submit a motion of no-confidence in the Knesset (parliament) on Monday. But Begin's ruling coalition, despite its narrow two-seat majority, was assured of easily defeating the motion with the support of leftist opposition parties.

French president thawing cold Israeli relationship

PARIS (AP) — President Francois Mitterrand takes an unprecedented step this week in an attempt to thaw out 15 years of chilled relations between France and Israel.

He is making a three-day visit to Israel, beginning Wednesday, and thus becomes the first French president to visit the country since its creation in 1948.

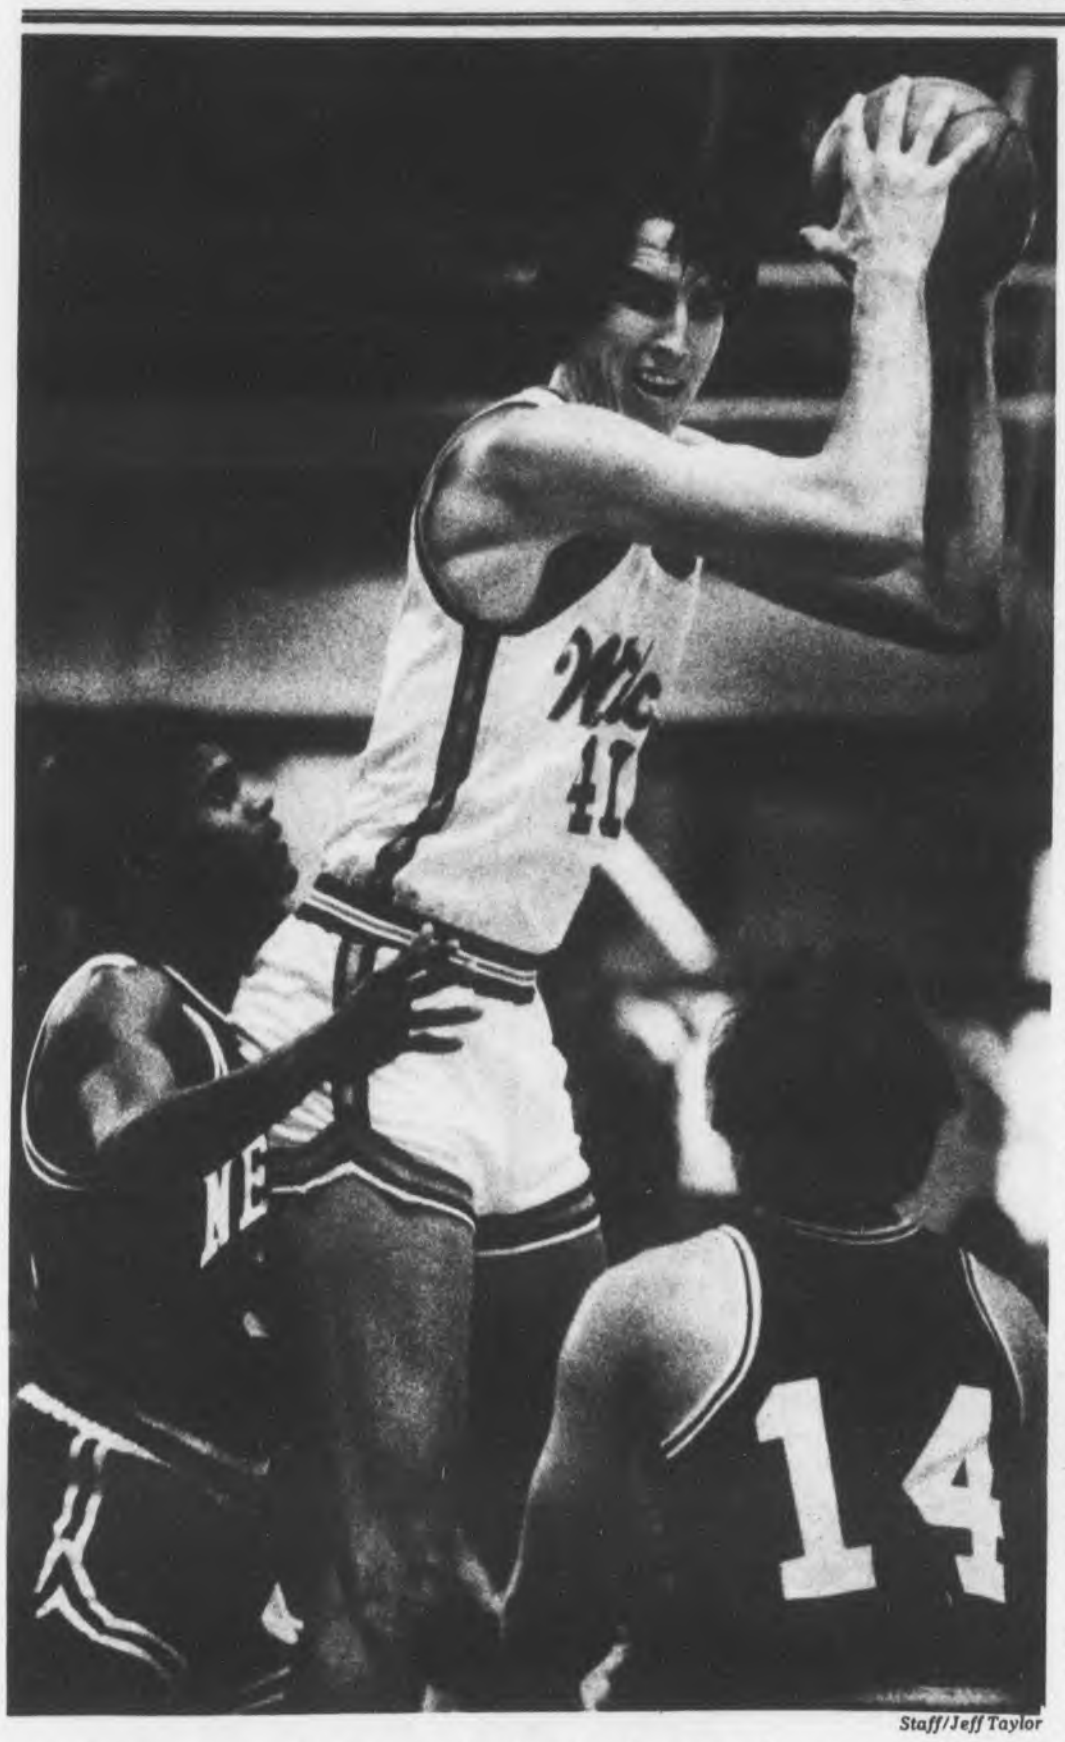
For the French, the matter has grown into a sensitive balancing act between Socialist Mitterrand's determination to be a "friend of Israel" and his desire to retain the rapport his predecessors established with the oil-rich Arab nations that fuel France.

Condemned by Arab leaders and welcomed by Israelis, the trip has provoked some of the most nagging foreign policy headaches for Mitterrand since he swept into power last May and installed France's first leftist government in 23 years.

To smooth over Arab feelings, Mitterrand had postponed or delayed the trip several times, first to show displeasure over Israel's bombing of a French-built nuclear reactor in Iraq last year and more recently as a response to Israel's annexation of the Syrian Golan Heights.

To calm the Israelis, Claude Cheysson, the French external relations minister, went to Jerusalem last December and announced France was willing to sell arms to Israel and end its weapons embargo that began with the 1967 Middle East war. He also tried to squelch European Middle East peace initiatives.

But to the ire of Israel, Cheysson announced last week that France favored the creation of a Palestinian state, specifying for the first time that the area for such a state was the Israeli-occupied Arab territories.



Cheysson also was quoted as saying he did not know of Palestinians who could take part in peace negotiations except for the Palestine Liberation Organization, which Israel refuses to recognize.

To the continuing discontent of the Arabs, Mitterrand has been an open supporter of the Egyptian-Israeli peace accords, unlike his conservative predecessor, President Valery Giscard d'Estaing.

Claiming the ball... K-State center Les Craft soars above two Nebraska defenders to retrieve a pass during the Wildcats 67-50 romp over the Cornhuskers Saturday in Ahearn Field House. Craft was the leading scorer for the 'Cats with 16 points.

'Cats defeat Nebraska, prepare for Jayhawks

By GAIL GAREY
Assistant Sports Editor

It is like comparing night and day — to Wildcat fans, Saturday's finale against the Nebraska Cornhuskers was not near as exciting as the match against the Univeristy of Kansas the week before.

Even Nebraska's Head Coach Moe Iba stated that the afternoon's match "wasn't a very pretty game for people to watch."

"A lot of it was due to what K-State did," Iba said.

And what K-State did was topple the Cornhuskers 67-50 bouncing back from the mid-season blues that left many doubting.

The Wildcats have won two of their toughest back-to-back road games (KU and Missouri), and are ready to face the Jayhawks for the third time Tuesday night in the first round of the Big Eight Post Season Tournament.

IN CONFERENCE PLAY, the 'Cats have played extremely well against KU, Hartman said. However, before the KU game he said "we got to going sideways there for a while, but we've popped out of it and are playing the way we are supposed to."

Evidence of the fact was K-State's play Saturday afternoon. The 'Cats were back to normal — playing well at both ends of the court, and giving the Huskers what Iba termed "just a good old country ass kicking."

"Our defense did an excellent job and our offense was good, too, although we sputtered a little at times," Hartman said.

The 'Cats shot 53 percent from the field scoring 67 points against the stingy Nebraska defense, ranked 10th nationally this season in scoring defense, who before, allowed its opponents only 55 points per game.

THE WILDCATS held the 'Huskers to 14 points in the first half. Nebraska hit only 36 percent of its shots.

The 'Cats not only controlled the boards but they set the pace early in the afternoon by grabbing the tip-off and slated two points after only 12 seconds of play.

Nebraska's first two points came when Jack Moore scored from outside the circle. Moore, an AP all-Big Eight first team selection, usually averages 13.8 points a game but only managed to add six to the Huskers total this game.

The 'Cats then came back building their lead to 6-2 as Les Craft tipped one in off a missed shot from Jankovich.

Craft led the Wildcats with 16 points on six of nine shooting attempts falling one short of his 17 point game high.

"Les played extremely well...very strong," Hartman said. "He's made steady progress."

GOING INTO the game, Craft said that he knew he would have to be more intense and concentrate better.

"I wanted to come back and play a good game because of the last one (in Lincoln).

The Wildcats held the Huskers at six for approximately five minutes of action as they doubled their lead making the score 12-6 with 10:19 remaining in the first half.

The Cats continued to build their lead as Randy Reed tipped in a missed free throw by Nealy.

Reed led the Wildcats in rebounding with 11 while K-State's leading rebounder Ed Nealy grabbed 10.

With 21 seconds left in the first half, Adams stuffed the ball giving the 'Cats their biggest lead as the buzzer sounded.

THE 'CATS returned to the floor to gain their biggest lead with 9:12 remaining in the second half when Adams connected on a 15 footer to give the 'Cats a 20 point advantage.

In the final five minutes of play, Hartman set his starting five on the bench allowing other players to see action. During this time Nebraska pulled within 12 points with 2:41 left to play.

That was the closest the Cornhuskers came to the Wildcats in the final minutes of play as K-State clenched its victory with a final basket by Neal Degner.

Injuries hurt Wildcat teams in conference indoor meet

By MACK McCLURE
Collegian Reporter

Injuries to key performers led to a general lack of depth for K-State's track squads. The result was a set of disappointing finishes in the Big Eight Indoor Track Championships, Friday and Saturday in Lincoln, Neb.

The women's team placed seventh among the eight teams. The men finished in last place.

"It's difficult to express how badly we feel about our performances," Head Track Coach Steve Miller said.

It was ironic that 14 out of K-State's 24 men who participated, had either life time or season bests in the meet.

Veryl Switzer was the only Wildcat to finish first in an event. His long jump of 25-6 was the best for the meet.

WILDCAT POLE VAULTER Doug Lytle, suffering from bruised heels, cleared 17-8¾ for second place. Oklahoma's Joe Dial captured first place with a height of 18-½, a new Big Eight record. Lytle held the old record of 17-4¾.

Also satisfied with his performance was K-State's 600-yard sprinter Mike Bradley, who celebrated his 21st birthday by qualifying for nationals.

The National Indoor Track Meet is set for next week at the Silverdome in Pontiac, Mich. Bradley placed third Saturday with a time of 1:09.95.

Bullock won with a time of 1:09.30.

In team standings, KU won the men's competition with 94 points paced by Bullock, triple jumper Greg Johnson, and world class high jumper Tyke Peacock.

Peacock stepped in to jump after playing in the Kansas-Iowa State game in Lawrence, 50 minutes earlier.

IOWA STATE was second with 80 points, followed by Oklahoma State, 79, Oklahoma 73, Nebraska 65, Missouri 57, Colorado 41, and K-State with 37 points.

In women's action, Nebraska won the meet with 159 points. The Cornhuskers had eight first place winners. Marlene Ottey set a Big Eight record in the 60-yard dash with a time of 6.6, the 440 with 54.25, and also ran the opening leg in the 220-yard relay.

Oklahoma took home second place with 96 points, followed by Iowa State 69, Kansas 60, Missouri 56, Colorado 39, K-State 30, and Oklahoma State with 12 points.

When asked about the womens' seventh place finish, Coach Miller responded, "we had a bad series of luck."

MISSING FROM the Wildcats' squad were Deb Pihl, Sheila Harrison and Kim Haggar who was ill.

Pihl, the meet favorite in the 880-yard dash and the winner in the heat in the preliminaries, suffered a cracked toe the night before. She was also one of the three favorites in the mile. Also because of her injury, the 'Cats scratched their two-mile relay team.

"It's safe to say that she would have accounted for 14 to 18 points," Miller said. He also added that she might have been the difference between fourth and seventh place.

Because of her pulled quadricep, Harrison, a sprinter, was unable to run in the 60-yard dash, the 300 yard-dash and the 880 relay.

Hagger, a returning All-American in the pentathlon from last year, was sorely missed..

Kelly Wenlock was K-State's only female first place finisher. She leaped 20-6 in the long jump, setting a Big Eight record. Wenlock, a native of Sunbury England, also placed fourth in the 300-yard dash with a time of 36.16.

Next action for the Wildcats will be Saturday when they host the TFA/USA District competition.

Women keep winning streak alive

By TIM UNRUH

WICHITA — It may not be a good bet to sit on an early lead — especially when playing on the road at Henry Levitt Arena.

K-State women learned that the big look bigger and small shoot better in Shocker country. Wichita State nearly pulled it off, but the 'Cats kept their composure and averted an upset, 68-63.

After Jackie Wilson put the Shockers on the board early with a 20-foot shot from right wing, K-State reeled off eight straight points. The 'Cats looked true to form. Taking advantage of Shocker miscues, K-State forwards Tammie Romstad and Barbara Gilmore opened the game picking off passes and grabbing defensive rebounds. Then it was left up to guards Betsy Sloan and Priscilla Gary to speed the game's pace.

With Wichita State's inability to play a transition game, Gary and Sloan shifted things into high gear and converted numerous fast breaks into layups. Shelly Hughes took a Sloan assist in for a layup with 16:03 left in the half, putting the Wildcats up 10-2.

THE NEXT three minutes belonged to the Shockers, as they poured in an 8-2 rally, to get back in contention. Wichita State's crib shot with 13:11 remaining drew the Shockers within two points, 12-10.

The Shockers' offense was working like a well-oiled machine. With good movement and hustle, Wichita State guard Paula Stanley was able to break loose for clear shots freethrow line, while Mattingly was continually open from the baseline.

Lisa Hodgson's 20-foot jumper with 9:38 remaining in the half, put the Shockers ahead 16-15.

Wildcat Head Coach Lynn Hickey said the Wichita State play was no surprise because the Shockers are known to play better at home.

"Wichita State played very, very well," Hickey said. "I thought we had their offense down, but they were running it so well and setting such good picks that they were getting the good shots."

WITH THERESA DREILING, 6-6, and Mary Kennedy, 6-5, filling the lane for the Shockers, Romstad found the going a little tough inside. The 'Cats went cold midway in the first half, but when Gary hit a 15-foot baseline jumper at the 6:06 mark, the 'Cats regained some momentum and the lead 23-22.

Gary and Stanley got into a shooting match for the next two minutes. Then Romstad hit a five-footer to put the 'Cats up by three, 27-24. That score held until the last minute when Stanley hit a five-foot shot in the lane, then Gary converted from 10 feet for the 'Cats.

Wichita State's Kathy Garofalo sank a 20-foot shot from the baseline with 32 seconds left to draw the Shockers within two points, 30-28. That's how the score stood at the first half buzzer.

"I didn't think our concentration was that good in the first half," Hickey said. "But we kept our heads in the second half."

STANLEY DIDN'T waste time in the second half, as she tied things with a 13-foot shot with 19:45 to play. Romstad countered with a hook shot and a five-foot bank shot to put the 'Cats up 34-30.

Romstad scored 13 points in the second half, most of which came through some quick moves underneath.

Hickey said the tall front line of Wichita State was quite an obstacle for Romstad.

"They (Shockers) were playing that standing 2-3 zone. Just the fact that Dreiling and Kennedy were in there with their arms up was bothering us," Hickey said. "We were trying to run our offense as solow as they were running their defense.

"Jean Roise really helped us in the game because of her outside shooting."

Stanley sank two free throws with 15:23 to play to put the Shockers ahead 36-24. Roise then sank a 20-foot shot to tie the game. Garofalo put the Shockers ahead again with a 10-foot baseline shot. Again Roise answered with a 20-footer.

THE TWO-POINT margin went back-and-forth until Barbara Gilmore and Romstad hit back-to-back buckets at the 13:26 mark to put K-State ahead 46-44. Roise hit another long-range jumper with 12:28 to play putting the 'Cats up by four, 48-44.

Hodgson tied the game for the last time on a layup with 9:50 left.

K-State did a repeat of the game's opening minutes outscoring Wichita State 10-2 by the six-minute mark.

The Shockers made a desperation run in the waning moments, but Gilmore sealed a win with 40 seconds left, hitting a five-foot baseline shot.

K-State upped its record to 23-5, and its winning streak to 14 games.

Gary led both sqauds in scoring with 19 points. Stanley was high for the Shockers with 17.

The 'Cats shot 53 percent from the floor and 54 percent from the freethrow line. Wichita State was 39 and 88 percent respectively.

Next action for the 'Cats is Saturday when they play host to Central Missouri State in the last game of the regular season.

Hearns ends fight early

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Thomas Hearns said he didn't plan to knock out Marcos Geraldo in the first round of their scheduled 10-round middleweight fight. Instead, he had wanted to test his durability over several rounds against the veteran Geraldo.

But Hearns' vaunted right hand ended the fight Saturday at 1:48 of the first round, and the former World Boxing Association welterweight champion barely got a chance to work up a sweat.

"This fight really didn't tell me too much," Hearns said. "My plans were to come out and do something totally different. I wanted to prove to the world there is more to me than just a slugger."

Hearns, fighting for the second time as a middleweight since losing his WBA welterweight title last September when he was knocked out in the 14th round by Sugar Ray Leonard, stunned Geraldo with two overhand rights midway through the first round, then finished him off with a left hook.

Geraldo struggled to his feet at the count of nine, but fell back to the canvas as referee Joey Curtis counted him out.

Hearns had planned to use the Geraldo fight as a barometer of his endurance against middleweights, but said he now would need another fight before deciding whether to challenge world middleweight champion Marvin Hagler for the title.

Hearns first fought as a middleweight last December when he outpointed Ernie Singletary in 10 rounds.

What Hearns really wants, and he is the first to admit it, is a rematch against Leonard. But Leonard, who provided ringside commentary for CBS at the fight from the Aladdin Hotel, said he wants to see some humility from Hearns before even thinking about fighting him again.

"I wouldn't mind fighting him again," said Leonard. "But he has to be honest with me and the public and admit he was hurt in the 14th round when I beat him. That's all I want. It would make having a rematch a lot easier."

Southern Illinois wins track title, Missouri Valley

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Southern Illinois took four running events and the high jump Sunday to capture its sixth Missouri Valley Conference indoor track and field championship in seven years.

Karsten Schulz won the mile run, Mike Franks won the 60-yard and 300-yard dashes, and the Southern Illinois team finished first in the mile relay as the Salukis finished with 151 points, 49 more than runner-up Illinois State.

The Salukis' Stephen Wray topped the high-jump competition with a leap of 7 feet, 1½ inches. Southern Illinois also took second-place honors in the 880-yard run (Gary Munson), 1,000-yard run (Tom Ross), 60-yard high hurdles (Parry Duncan), 440-yard dash (Tony Adams) and the mile run (Ross).

Saluki athletes won the pole vault, shot put and long-jump events on Saturday.

It was the third straight year Southern Illinois topped the eight-team field after missing the meet in 1979 because of a snowstorm.

Big Eight tourney: Who needs it?

The time is ripe, the time is right. It's time to do away with the Big Eight Post Season Tournament. The fiasco that culminates in Kansas City the first weekend in March was born in 1977. Since then only half of the conference schools have won the tournament — K-State, Missouri, Kansas and Oklahoma. The other schools probably adore the post-season follies because it gives them one last chance at making the NCAA tourney.

In its five years of existence, only two regular season champions have also captured the post season honors. K-State did it in 1977 and Oklahoma followed suit in 1979. Missouri won the league in 1980 and 1981 but could not match those titles in post season.

The schools with the poorer records should not be considered for post-season play. Would it not be an embarrassment to the Big Eight if Colorado sneaked up on the powers of the conference and won the tourney? Many would say it would be good for the conference to get another team into the tournament. But that should not be the case when a team plays superbly for only three games.

How would the Big Eight look after sending a team to the NCAA tourney with a 3-11 league record? Probably a little red-faced. I also think it would not be a good image builder for the conference.

People with fairly good memories may recall in 1978 when Missouri went 4-10 in league games and caught fire in time to take post-season honors. The Tigers entered the NCAA tournament with an unimpressive total of 12 wins and quickly fell in the first round to Utah.

A similar incident occurred last season when Southeastern Conference underdog Mississippi, sixth in the league, surprised its opponents and won the post-season get together. They also slipped in the first round against Kansas.

One of the few remaining conferences not using post-season play is the Big Ten. That conference has produced three national championship teams in the last six years. Indiana won titles in 1976 and 1981 while Michigan State took honors in 1979. Just for the record, Indiana defeated another Big Ten school, Michigan, in the 1976 finals.

The Big Ten does play more conference games than the Big Eight, but teams don't have the added pressure of an additional tournament.

All that I am suggesting is that first we let the conference winners get their automatic invitations to the tourney. Teams finishing second, third or fourth with good enough records can also qualify for the NCAA or National Invitational tournaments. Let's send the teams with the best records to the tournaments and represent the Big Eight as it should be represented — by winners.

Maryland stuns Virginia

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Maryland Coach Lefty Driesell knows that in order to beat the Virginia basketball team, the Cavaliers' 7-foot-4 center, Ralph Sampson, must be held in check.

So, naturally, that was the first order of business Saturday — and a big reason why the Terps shocked the nation's topranked club in overtime, 47-46.

"Our defense was great," said Driesell. "We did a pretty good job of taking Sampson out of the game. Herman Veal and Mark Fothergill did a great job on him."

The usually high-scoring Sampson managed only one field goal while playing 43 minutes and wound up with a meager eight points and five rebounds. Sampson had a chance to win the game in the closing seconds of regulation, but missed one of two foul shots.

Meanwhile, Maryland freshman Adrian Branch stole the spotlight from the towering Sampson. Branch scored a game-high 29 points, including a jump shot from the foul line with one second left in overtime for the winning basket.

"When you're a kid, you dream about being a hero and taking the last shot before a packed house to beat a big team," said Branch.

Sampson had hit two free throws with 4:10 left in overtime to put Virginia ahead 46-45. Maryland then controlled the ball the rest of the way before calling a timeout with 13 seconds left to set up Branch's winning shot.

Virginia was one of seven Top Twenty teams that lost Saturday. Rutgers shocked No.6 West Virginia 74-64, stopping the nation's longest winning streak at 23 games; Louisiana State jolted No.7 Kentucky 94-78; Bradley edged No.8 Tulsa 82-79; Pepperdine beat No.16 San Francisco 106-100.

In other games involving the nation's ranked teams, No.2 North Carolina stopped Duke 84-66; No.4 Oregon State beat Southern California 45-36; No.9 Idaho downed Boise State 83-77; No.10 Memphis State crushed St. Louis 94-72; No.13 Minnesota outlasted No.11 Iowa 57-55 in triple overtime; No.12 Georgetown walloped Connecticut 60-42; No.14 Fresno State beat Utah State 73-61; No.15 Arkansas trimmed Texas Tech 67-61; No.18 Wake Forest beat North Carolina State 50-46, and No.20 UCLA stopped Oregon 88-66.

The only Top 20 team in action Sunday was No.3 DePaul, which pounded Notre Dame 81-69 behind 28 points by junior forward Terry Cummings. The game marked the regular season finale for the Blue Demons, 26-1, with the nation's longest major college winning streak of 21 straight games. Notre Dame fell to a disappointing 8-16.

Aid cutbacks: National Student Lobby Day on Capitol Hill fights proposed cuts in federal financial aid

WASHINGTON (AP) — Thousands of college students, some chanting "books not bombs," on Monday lobbied Congress against President Reagan's proposed cutbacks in federal grants and loans for education.

The large turnout came amid mounting signs of resistance among both Republicans and Democrats to Reagan's call for cutting education aid from $13 billion to less than $10 billion in fiscal 1983.

Many students arrived in buses chartered by their schools or student associations.

"I'm very scared," said Fran Pheeny, 21, a New York University sophomore. "It does seem (Reagan) has lost some support, but I'm still very scared."

Nearly a dozen lawmakers delivered speeches of support to more than 500 students who crammed into a room in a House office building.

The so-called National Student Lobby Day, organized by nine national student groups, was to end with a rally on the Capitol steps.

Rep. Carl Perkins (D-Ky.), chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, told the students: "We are going to prohibit any further cutbacks and we should commence to restore the cuts that have already been made. ... We are going to prevail."

SOME OF THE 21 freshmen Republican members of the House who have sent Reagan a letter attacking his education cuts as "unacceptable" and "unfair" held a news conference to support the student lobbyists. Several said Reagan should reduce his proposed increases in defense spending.

But Rep. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho) also lectured students to pay back their loans. "If you have to drive a used car and live in an apartment for a few years to get your loan paid off, you ought to do it," he said.

Reagan wants to make graduate students accrue interest on their loans while they are still in school. Their monthly interest payments alone could range up to $466.

UNDER LOAN CUTBACKS that Reagan wants to put into effect April 1, graduate students would be barred from getting the 9 percent Guaranteed Student Loans on which the government pays all the interest until after a student leaves school.

Instead, he wants the graduate students to borrow under a 14 percent auxiliary loan program, with no in-school interest subsidy, and to boost their debt ceiling from $25,000 to $40,000.

Reagan also wants to double the 5 percent origination fee that undergraduates pay for Guaranteed Student Loans, subject all borrowers to a needs test and make the students repay at market rates — currently around 19 percent — two years after leaving college.

Reagan also wants to cut $1.5 billion from Pell Grants, work-study funds, National Direct Student Loans and other aid programs now costing $3.3 billion. Those cuts would affect awards in the 1983-84 school year.

The GSL program now costs the government $2.7 billion. The administration says its costs would rise to $3.4 billion next year without the cutbacks to hold its cost to $2.5 billion.

Atlanta task force to be disbanded

ATLANTA (AP) — With the conviction of Wayne B. Williams in the slayings of two young blacks, police have closed the books on 21 other slayings in a 22-month string of killings, Atlanta Public Safety Commissioner Lee Brown said Monday.

A special task force created in July 1980 to investigate the cases will be disbanded next Monday, Brown said.

"Do you believe Wayne Williams committed 23 murders?" Brown was asked.

"Yes we do," said Brown, who made the announcement at a news conference with top federal, state, county and city law enforcement officers.

The officials met for one hour and 20 minutes at the task force headquarters to make their decision.

"With the conviction of Wayne B. Williams; we have as a result cleared 23 cases, based upon the evidence," Brown said. Seven other cases will remain open but will be turned over to the ordinary jurisdictions involved, he said.

Williams, a 23-year-old black freelance photographer and aspiring talent promoter, was convicted of murder Saturday in the slayings of Nathaniel Cater, 27, and Jimmy Ray Payne, 21, the 26th and 28th victims on the task force list. He was sentenced to two life prison terms and has said he will appeal.

FULTON COUNTY District Attorney Lewis Slaton and DeKalb County prosecutor Robert Wilson, in whose jurisdictions most of the cases lie, met with the police officials Monday and said no more indictments will be sought against Williams.

The task force list included the slayings of Cater, Payne and 26 other young blacks, as well as the disappearance of 10-year-old Darron Glass, who has never been found.

In addition to those 29 cases, Brown said officials have "cleared" the case of John Howard Porter, 30, who was stabbed to death in April 1981 but was not added to the list.

THE SEVEN CASES that remain open are those of Edward Hope Smith, Angel Lanier, Latonya Wilson, Milton Harvey, Jefferey Mathis, Patrick Rogers and Glass, Brown said.

"We think the community, which stood behind the investigation, certainly understands that the evidence we possess, some of which has not been made public, is what's being used to make the decision" to close the task force, Brown said.

Brown denied reports that young blacks fitting the profile of those on the task force list have been slain since Williams' arrest last June.

"There have been no killings unsolved that fit," he said.

The official also denied that, during the height of the investigation, he had said he believed more than one killer was involved in the slayings.

"We did not know, and we did not exclude any possibilities," Brown said. "Our statements were always based on the information we had."

THE WALLS OF the task force's office, once covered with composite drawings made by psychics and police sketch artists during the height of the investigation, are now bare. A lone recruit sits at the telephone table where 20 lines once were busy constantly.

An investigator who asked not to be identified said Sunday that evidence existed to link Williams to 24 of the 26 remaining cases, but Slaton said earlier Monday that police would consider closing only those cases where more than one type of evidence existed to link Williams to the victim.

Officials gauge economy: faint but will recover

WASHINGTON (AP) — The broadest gauge of the nation's future economic health fell for the ninth straight month in January, indicating, in the words of Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige, "that the recession has yet to run its course."

And Deputy Treasury Secretary R. T. McNamar conceded in a speech Monday that the economy is still performing poorly and "the current downturn will be far worse than envisioned in our earlier scenarios."

McNamar said that unemployment — 8.5 percent of the work force in January — "may yet go to 10 percent before we get things turned around." Although Baldrige and McNamar's boss, Treasury Secretary Donald T. Regan, have made similar estimates recently, the administration has generally tried to emphasize recent declines in inflation rather than increases in the jobless rate.

However, Baldrige and several private economists said Monday that recovery could still arrive by late spring or early summer, especially if interest rates continue their recent decline.

THE COMMERCE DEPARTMENT'S Index of Leading Indicators dropped 0.6 percent in January and would have fallen nearly five times as much if officials had not deleted effects of a sharply reduced average workweek, a figure they said was distorted by severe weather.

But Baldrige noted that January's announced decline — and the 0.3 percent drops of November and December — were much smaller than those of last autumn. And he said, "The fact that the indicators were on the minus side in January is not inconsistent with forecasts of a second quarter recovery in the economy."

ALAN GREENSPAN, an outside economic adviser to the administration, said he believes the recovery will begin soon, but conceded there are no signs of it yet.

"Thus, while the evidence shows the rate of decline is slowing and, in fact, we may

HOUSE SPEAKER Wendell Lady is confident the severance tax proposal will receive the House's approval. See page 2.

Severance tax faces test in House

TOPEKA (AP) — The Kansas House geared up Monday for the first big test on the severance tax in the 1982 legislative session, amid predictions it would pass that body and go to the Senate where its chances are regarded as 50-50.

"I'm satisfied there will be 63 votes for it in the House and that's all we need," said Speaker Wendell Lady on the eve of Tuesday's debate on a bill endorsed last week by the House Assessment and Taxation Committee.

"I feel confident it will pass. What the exact count will be, I don't know," added Lady.

Rep. Robert Vancrum, a Republican from Overland Park as is Lady, will carry the bill in floor debate. Reps. Robert Frey (R-Liberal) and Keith Farrar (R-Hugoton) are expected to spearhead the opposition.

Vancrum will promote it as the answer to the state's funding problems for schools and highways. Frey and Farrar will attack it as detrimental to the state's economy, especially the oil and gas industry.

LADY SAID Monday he plans to speak on behalf of the bill, telling the House the oil and gas industry's opposition is uconscionable in his view, since it stands to pile up even more massive profits under federal decontrol of the industry and rollbacks in the windfall profits tax next year.

The bill would impose a 3½ percent mineral production tax on oil and gas and a 2½ percent tax on natural gas liquids. It is part of a compromise tax package developed in the House. That plan also includes a two-cent increase in the state's gasoline and diesel fuel taxes and a $45 million tranfer of sales tax revenue collected on the sale of motor vehicles from the general fund to the highway fund.

If the House passes this severance tax plan, it is regarded as a toss-up whether it can pass the Senate.

However, severance tax proponents say there have been changes in the positions of several senators and they are now encouraged it can win 21 votes if it ever comes to a vote in the full Senate.

IT FIRST must pass the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee and then the Ways and Means Committee before it would get to the Senate floor for debate and a vote. That is where Senate President Ross Doyen, a staunch opponent of the tax, can block it.

Lady hesitated for a time Monday in placing the bill on Tuesday's debate calendar. He did so, he later told reporters, because he wanted to be certain all the severance tax supporters would be present Tuesday.

Lady shepherded a severance tax bill through the 1981 session and said he doesn't want any slipups on getting this one through, too.

The House did not debate bills Monday but gave final passage to five relatively minor bills it had debated Friday.

Passed 118-2 and sent to the Senate was a bill allowing Kansas courts to employ psychologists to examine defendants to determine if they are competent to stand trial. They presently can hire only psychiatrists.

Another bill, sent to the Senate on a vote of 120-1, permits the courts to order youths declared delinquents to attend school until they are 18.

Auto workers, Ford reach historic pact

DEARBORN, Mich. — Officials of the United Auto Workers union and Ford Motor Co. on Monday signed a historic agreement expected to save the automaker $1 billion over 31 months, but analysts say consumers should not expect big drops in the prices of Ford cars.

The analysts say only an upturn in car sales will bring back profits and put laid-off workers back on the assembly lines.

The accord, ratified by a 3-1 margin in week-long voting that ended Sunday, took effect as soon as it was signed.

The contract bargaining came six months early in the midst of the devastating auto sales slump. The old contract would have expired Sept. 14.

Soviet space probe lands on Venus

MOSCOW — A Soviet space probe soft-landed Monday on Venus and transmitted scientific data for more than two hours from the planet nearest Earth, the official news agency Tass said.

A descent module carrying instruments and cameras landed on the plains east of the Phoebus area after a parachute descent, climaxing a four-month flight aboard the unmanned Venus 13 spacecraft, Tass said.

The spacecraft continued its flight past Venus after the space probe was launched from a distance of about 22,300 miles from the planet's surface, the news agency said.

Tass said Venus 14, launched four days after Venus 13, is expected to reach the planet on Friday.

The Soviet Union, like the United States, has previously landed several space probes on Venus.

During the 127 minutes of transmission from the surface, "panoramic pictures of the surrounding landscape" were received by Soviet scientists. The data was transmitted by the module to the Venus 13 spacecraft and then relayed to the earth.

Grain elevator bill receives little support

TOPEKA — Creation of a grain indemnity fund to cover financial losses at bankrupt grain elevators is getting little support in the Senate Agriculture and Livestock Committee.

Following the financial collapse of two Kansas elevators in 1980, the Legislature has considered creating a grain fund similar to one in Oklahoma.

Committee chairman Sen. Fred Kerr (R.-Pratt) questioned if perhaps the proposal was "overkill" given the isolated failures of Kansas elevators.

Hearings were held on the bill Monday with a committee vote expected on either Wednesday or Thursday.

The fund would be created by charging a one-mill levy on each bushel of commercially stored grain. The levy would be split equally between the elevator operator and the farmer.

Hyatt-Regency reaches new settlements

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Out-of-court settlements totaling about $800,000 were approved in federal court Monday for families of three persons killed in the Hyatt-Regency walkways collapse last summer.

The settlements went to the families of two members of the Mariachi Estrella band of Our Lady of Guadalupe Catholic Church in Topeka and the family of a Kansas City man who were among 114 persons fatally injured in the July 17 collapse.

Abel Alcala, the husband of Consuelo Jacinta Alcala, who was killed in the collapse, was awarded about $275,000 in cash and annuity payments. His wife's mother received a $36,000 annuity.

Basilio Galvan, the father of the late Dolores Galvan, was awarded about $155,000 in cash and annuity payments.

Suits seeking about $3 billion were filed after the two walkways collapsed during a Friday tea dance in the Hyatt Regency lobby. Out-of-court settlements totaling about $5 million were announced earlier.

Couple counsels 'close encounter' victims

SEATTLE — Aileen and Dan Edwards hold the closest encounter sessions this side of the Milky Way.

The couple have formed the UFO Contact Center to counsel people who — like themselves — claim close encounters with beings from other worlds.

Most people who have seen an Unidentified Flying Object or a being from outer space "don't have anybody to talk to" afterward, Aileen said. "Confusion reigns supreme, and they may become very erratic in their behavior."

In short, they need help, and the Edwardses use hypnosis and group therapy to help "contactees" come to grips with blips.

Aileen is a secretary for Boeing Co. and her husband is a quality-control supervisor for a company he will not name because his superiors may not approve of the center.

Edwards said the group now has 50 members, of which 26 are "good solid cases" with strong evidence of having been contacted.

Puerto Rico is a concern for all

Wall Street was rocking with activity Sunday — not with the fury of money changing hands and deals being made during a weekend session, but with the power of explosives.

Four dynamite bombs exploded, one in the American Stock Exchange, two at the New York Stock Exchange and another at the Chase Manhattan bank. Damages did not deter the markets from opening — business follows the entertainment tradition that the show must go on — especially when it concerns the daily gauging of the heartbeat of the nation's economy.

The Associated Press reports that a Puerto Rican nationalist group, the Armed Forces for National Liberation (FALN) which seeks independence for the U.S.-related commonwealth, has claimed responsibility for the incidents.

The current administration and Congress contain supporters of a move to make Puerto Rico the 51st member of the United States of America, a move which the majority of Puerto Rico's population disapproves of and the majority of the current 50 states' population is either unaware of or uninformed about. The consequences of such a move will affect a great many lives and institutions. Therefore, it should not be taken lightly.

It is unfortunate that terrorists such as the FALN believe that violence is the only effective method of bringing such an issue and its alternatives or solutions to the forefront.

If the question of independence versus statehood for Puerto Rico is addressed during this four-year Republican term, the legislatures of our country should not overlook a part of the democratic policy that perpetrates our governmental philosophies, listening to the voices and wishes of the people.

The future of Puerto Rico should be determined by its inhabitants, just as the future of the United States of America should be determined by its population.

Letters

Actions violate laws

Editor,

More than 500,000 Americans have given their lives fighting in WWI, WWII, Korea and Vietnam, and eight in Iran, because they believed in America and its Constitution.

The rights and the freedoms that we as U.S. citizens have enjoyed throughout our lifetime have been possible because of those 500,008 brave men. I would like to pay tribute to those men who have died for this country through this letter.

I myself fought for this country in Vietnam and I would do so again if necessary to protect the lives and freedoms of America.

I not only oppose the distribution of anti-U.S. materials on this campus, but I think it should be stopped. I believe that the Iranian students who are guilty of distributing these materials are in violation of Article III, section three, of the United States Constitution.

I fully realize that these students will scream that I am trying to supress their Constitutional right to freedom of speech. However, I cannot find a single statement, not a single article, nor a single amendment to the U.S. Constitution giving Iranians the right to freedom of speech, nor any other rights for that matter.

These students are guests in this country. There are laws that protect them while they are here, as long as they obey the laws of the land. One of the Iranian students here at K-State told me that he is indeed a spy for Iran. This leads me to believe that their opposition to the U.S. government involves plots with a foreign power. This is a clear violation of Article III, section three of the U.S. Constitution and it should be stopped.

Questions to raise concerning nuclear power

Confusion reigned. Cries of disbelief echoed from corners of the nation and closed minds shut tighter when the trickle of whispered information on a partial meltdown of the fuel core at Three Mile Island turned into an emergency, an evacuation, and finally a national concern.

Questions were raised three summers ago on nuclear power — the danger, the payoffs, the profits ... the danger. The emotions and pressures of panic nagged in the confines of minds scared of someday being evacuated from homes — homes too close to the neighborhood nuclear reactor.

The voiced complaints have passed with worries of hostages, unemployment and struggles to make a living in the midst of Reagan's knifing of social welfare. Only protesters left over from the '60s carry picket signs and watch the stealthy moves of big-time power companies.

BUT NUCLEAR POWER PLANTS are creeping up on us. Three-mile Island did not deter the power companies from planning and building more plants to heat our homes and warm our soup.

Today there are 72 nuclear power plants in the United States with operating licenses in Nuclear Regulatory Commission records. There are several plants, such as the Diablo Canyon nuclear power plant in California, waiting for the kinks to be worked out before they can be licensed and several companies like the Washington Public Power Supply System that are in the process of building but for a lack of funds have considered stopping construction.

THEY ARE CREEPING up on us, and without even realizing the consequences, we are letting the threat of radiation sneak into the veins of our land.

A threat has been proven by the number of accidents and mishaps which plague the nuclear power plants struggling to operation. Currently, one-third of the nation's nuclear power plants are shut down — most due to problems that lead to radiation and water leaks. Three units are closed indefinitely for long-term repairs. These include Three Mile Island, which still hasn't figured out how to rid itself of wastes that won't be at a safe level of radioactivity for at least 50 years.

THESE PLANTS are closed because they have problems, but every steam generator tube that remains plugged halts the flow of money into the pockets of power companies. They want them open as soon as is imaginably possible. But is safety being forfeited for the sound of jingling coins?

Incidences where utility officials went ahead with operating even though all was not right in the system aren't uncommon. According to an Associated Press story February 7: A unit continued operating at the Nine Mile Point 1 plant in Oswego, N.Y. while workers decontaminated a ventilation system and cleaned up a spill of radioactive sludge; radioactive gas was leaked for three to four minutes at the Fort Calhoun nuclear plant near Omaha, Neb. without interrupting plant operation. A February 12 story by AP reported the Nuclear Regulatory Commission rejected a bid to reopen the Ginna nuclear power plant at Rochester, N.Y. More defects in the plant were found after the utility officials said it would be safe to open.

THERE ARE PROBLEMS with nuclear power plants and there are responsible persons dealing with them. But many problems slide by, overlooked in the facade of glossing over nuclear power so the public doesn't feel the twinge of panic on the backs of their necks when a construction company starts setting up in the lot next door.

But it's the twinge of panic that is going to prevent neighborhoods from being evacuated and power plants from distributing potassium iodide tablets to a frightened crowd.

Nuclear power isn't slowing up — it's just screwing up. Nuclear power plants are being built and operated without considering that the human element is not infallible.

President Reagan announced last October that we should increase construction of nuclear plants, speed up the licensing procedures and find demonstration sites to test burying nuclear wastes underground.

It's time to take a watchdog attitude and check out what is happening in nuclear power. Don't let the days slide by until one turns dark with the shadow of a major nuclear accident.

Premier asks Kremlin to aid Polish economy

MOSCOW (AP) — Poland's martial law ruler, Premier Wojciech Jaruzelski, blamed U.S. sanctions for aggravating the Polish crisis and said Monday that Soviet aid is essential to solving his nation's "very grave" economic problems.

In a dinner speech after opening two days of talks with Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev, Jaruzelski described the Soviet-Polish alliance as "lasting and inviolable" and pledged that Poland will not be a "weak link" in the Soviet bloc.

But he said Poland needs more aid to bail out its economy, which owes an estimated $26.5 billion to Western governments and banks. The Soviet Union has reportedly supplied millions of dollars in aid since Jaruzelski imposed martial law Dec. 13 after 16 months of labor unrest and challenges to Communist authority by the now-suspended trade union Solidarity.

"Our situation is also being significantly complicated by the economic sanctions introduced by the American administration, as well as under its pressure — by the governments of some other capitalist countries," Jaruzelski said in the speech, later distributed by Tass, the official Soviet news agency.

The Reagan administration and some other countries have introduced limited economic sanctions against Poland to pressure the nation's government into lifting martial law and releasing thousands of internees. Washington has also imposed sanctions on the Soviet Union in response to the Polish crackdown.

The Soviet Union "is our main, especially valuable economic partner and the closest ally," the Polish general and Communist Party chief assured Brezhnev during his first trip abroad since imposing martial law.

Earlier, Brezhnev said in his opening speech that the Soviets approved of Jaruzelski's crackdown.

"We received with full understanding the information on the national decision taken by our Polish friends," Brezhnev said. "These are timely measures. Had the Communists given way to the counter-revolution, had they wavered under the furious attacks by the enemies of socialism, the destinies of Poland, stability in Europe and in the world at large would have been jeopardized."

Atlanta

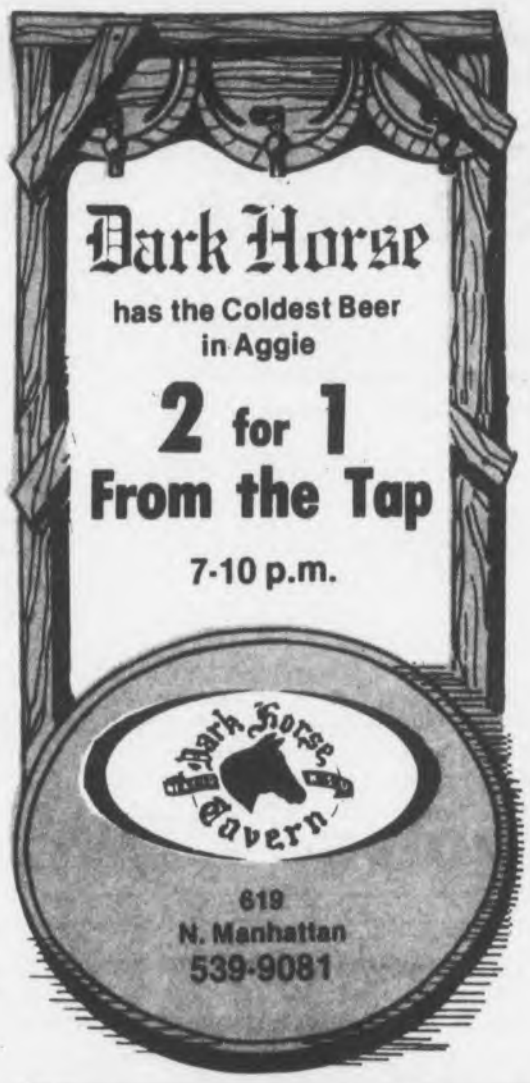
Evidence in 10 of the 21 additional cases closed by Brown on Monday was presented by prosecutors at Williams' trial in an effort to establish a pattern of killings that would fit the Cater and Payne cases.

THE DISCLOSURE that police planned to close the books on some of the remaining cases brought an angry reaction earlier Monday from a civil rights group and members of several public housing tenants' organizations.

"We're not willing to accept the whitewash attitude ... that all of the murders, or most of the murders, can be linked to Wayne Williams," said the Rev. Joe Boone, head of the Metro Atlanta Summit Congress, a civil rights group.

Boone and eight representatives of several tenants' organizatins held a news conference at City Hall before the law enforcement officials' meeting.

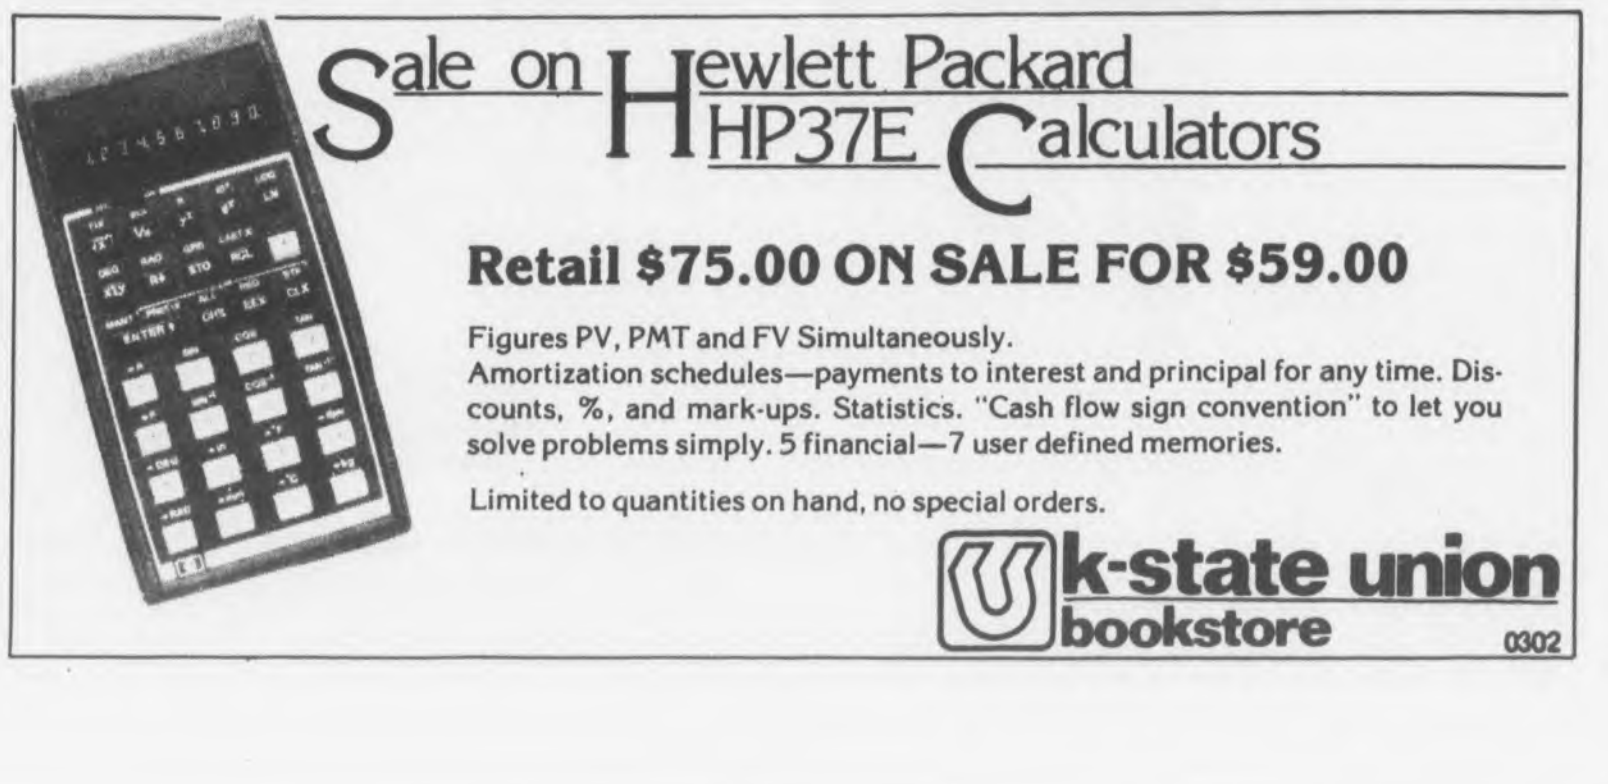
Boone noted that the two victims Williams was convicted of murdering were adults.



Career planning readies offices for open house

The Career Planning and Placement Center is opening its doors to the University community for an open house in its new offices in Holtz Hall from 2 to 4 p.m. today, Wednesday and Friday.

The open house will include a brief orientation and refreshments, according to Gail Zeller, administrative assistant.



To guarantee everyone attending a chance to examine the new facilities unhurriedly, persons from Student Personnel Services and the colleges of engineering and home economics are scheduled for today. Persons from the colleges of agriculture, arts and sciences, and business administration are scheduled Wednesday, and the colleges of architecture and design, education, veterinary medicine, and all others on Friday. General administration staff are also invited to attend on Friday.

The schedule of visiting hours is not rigid, and anyone wishing to visit with other groups is welcome, Zeller added.

Wall Street bombings mark anniversary for terrorists

NEW YORK (AP) — Four explosions that rocked Wall Street were evidence that the Puerto Rican terrorist group FALN has recovered from a series of arrests last year and is back in business, the FBI said Monday.

The explosions late Sunday, when the nation's financial district was virtually empty, apparently were timed to mark the March 1, 1954, attack by Puerto Rican nationalists who opened fire from the House of Representatives visitors' gallery and wounded five congressmen.

The bombings "could translate into a buildup of a new leadership" of the FALN, which was dealt a serious blow in June 1980 when 11 of its top members were arrested and subsequently convicted in Chicago, said Kenneth Walton, the assistant deputy director of the FBI in New York.

The bombs shattered windows and caused minor structural damage to buildings but no one was injured, police said.

Hit were the New York and American stock exchanges and the headquarters of the Merrill Lynch investment firm and Chase Manhattan Bank.

The bombs were "high-order explosives, three to five sticks of dynamite," said Patrick Murphy, the police department's chief of operations. "If anyone had been in the vicinity of those blasts they would have been killed."

In all, the FALN has claimed responsibility for 62 bomb blasts in the United States, most in New York and Chicago, and five people have been killed.

An anonymous caller to The Associated Press gave directions that led police to a telephone booth miles from the explosion scene, where a five-page, neatly typed communique claiming responsible for the incident was found.

Economy

have hit bottom, indications of an upturn are scant at best," Greenspan told the Senate Budget Committee.

Recovery toward the end of the April to June quarter "is still possible," said Donald Straszheim, vice president of Wharton Econometrics in Philadelphia. "Mid-year is a reasonable kind of assumption for a turnaround."

And Sandra Shaber, director of consumer economics for Chase Econometrics in Bala Cynwyd, Pa., said, "If the economy hasn't hit bottom yet, we're close."

NEITHER PRIVATE ANALYST had anything good to say about a recent spate of articles raising the possibility that the current recession will deepen into a full-scale depression rather than beginning at least a modest recovery.

Shaber said she feels there is "an undue amount of pessimism" about the economy. And Straszheim said, "I don't believe at all this depression kind of talk."

But both pointed to positive current and future factors such as manufacturers' efforts to cut down inventories of unsold goods, a big tax cut scheduled for July, a significant decline in inflation and at least the beginnings of a decline in interest rates.

Student traveler cards offer lower fares, rates

By PAM FITZSIMMONS
Collegian Reporter

The Eiffel Tower in Paris. The canals in Venice. The Leaning Tower of Pisa. Museums and castles in Germany. All these places and many more are available to the student traveler at a reduced rate.

There is an option available for students who are interested in traveling anywhere in the world. With the help of local travel agencies and by using the International Student Identity Card (ISID), students may find international travel more economical than they thought.

The ISID is available to students who are enrolled in six or more hours and to all high school students. The card offers reduced or free admission to many museums, theaters, cultural and historical sites, plus discounts for air fares, accommodations and tours.

ISID APPLICATION forms are available in the Activities Center on the third floor of the Union. Students applying for an ISID must take their applications to the registrar's office for verification of status and return it to the Activities Center with $6 and a passport-size picture, according to Janell Berroth, secretary for the Activities Center.

"It took me about 10 minutes to get it, and I've used it quite a bit. It is cheaper to get into castles and museums with the card," Cathy Rohleder, senior in graphic design, said. Rohleder is currently attending school in Germany.

According to Berroth, only 22 students applied for an ISID from September to February, but she said she believes that more will apply as summer approaches.

After receiving the ISID, students wishing to travel should visit local travel agencies to find out which agency they like the best and which one provides them the most help, according to Joan Schnorf, travel consultant at Creative Travel, 3017 Anderson.

TRAVEL AGENCIES can help with passports, airline tickets, places to see and provide information on rail travel in Europe, Schnorf said. These services are free because travel agencies are supported by airlines, she added.

After deciding on a travel agency, the student must complete a passport application. Persons applying for a passport should fill out their applications soon because as it gets closer to the peak travel season in May, it takes longer for passports to be processed, Schnorf said.

Currently it takes less than a month for a passport to be returned. Applicants need a birth certificate and a $15 passport fee to take with them to the Post Office where the applications are processed.

Once the task of applying for a passport is complete, a student must decide when and how he is going to travel.

"Plenty of package tours are available, or you can do your own thing," Schnorf said. Most students shy away from tours because they prefer more freedom in where and when they would go someplace else, she added.

Whatever students decide to do, Schnorf urges that plans should be finalized at least one month ahead of the travel date to avoid being rushed.

Young farmers face family tensions

By TIM MORSE
Collegian Reporter

The farmers were in good spirits. High costs and low prices seemed irrelevant at the moment. They shared in common talk as waiters and waitresses buzzed about the banquet tables.

Farm families appeared to be united as they waited to hear speeches on the makeup of farm families today during the 20th annual Kansas Young Farmers and Young Farm Wives convention Friday night at the Holiday Inn Holidome.

Hira Drache, professor of history at Concordia College in Minnesota and cattle feedlot manager, spoke about "the portrait of a successful farm family."

"What I'm going to talk to you about tonight is going to irritate some of you, and that's good, 'cause I might get you irritated into thinking," Drache said.

"The economic conditions of any time do not determine your destiny. If you're a poor-mouther, if you're hanging around the elevator driveways, the coffee shops and the beer joints, and listening to all of the negative talk, you're doomed," he said.

DRACHE JOKED about his personal experiences, some of which resulted in failures.

"Poor mouthing is no place for you. If you haven't got the guts and your wife hasn't got the stamina to stand the cycling up and down of agriculture...If you think it's been wild in the past, just watch the next 20 to 30 years. It's going to get more exciting, more opportunistic and more tension filled," Drache said.

"If the thought of expensive farming scares you, then you're either over 30 or you do not have the constitutional make-up to be a farmer in today's management, technology, capital- intense agriculture. Capital is still the cheapest input we have available to us today in farming," he said.

DRACHE SPOKE of the phenomenal amount of money borrowed by only 2.7 percent of "the total occupational force." He said farmers borrowed $110 billion last year. "Only the government of the United States borrows more."

Young farmers have never had a better opportunity, he said. "The one thing most young people are overlooking today is ontracts."

A 486-farm survey of 10 counties in northwest Minnesota showed that the top farmers there spent more money and that management was the difference, according to Drache. They used better seed and chemicals, consulted experts, spent more on daily living, and in the end, produced more bushels to the acre.

HE SAID young farmers need to be innovation-oriented and more visible. "There is an old saying about this. The higher the monkey is on his tree, the more visible his rear is. And people say, 'What's he (the farmer) trying to do, show off?'" He said people need to be more free about leading and trying new things.

Successful farmers should "succeed as they give," Drache said. "If you aren't a successful farmer of helping the world, you aren't doing much ... You see opportunities in every obstacle.

"There is a price for every reward," he said. He commented that people who are tight with money may not achieve their goals. A good budget is essential, Drache said, but in order to be successful the farmer must spend some money, be it for a vacation or hybrid seed.

Drache also expressed his appreciation for the family farm wife and mother.

"Why should the wife be the record bookkeeper? Because on most farms in America 75 percent of the net profit potential is spent by the wife ... the wife is the attitude setter and the wife has the ability to turn that faucet shut," he said.

IN SPITE OF bleak economic conditions, Drache said, "There can be no success without failure. Bad years make good managers." Farmers should learn from failures and not panic when problems arise.

Farmers

"Go talk to your neighbors," he added.

Ron Hanson spoke at the breakfast banquet Saturday morning. Hanson, an associate professor of farm management and agricultural finance at the University of Nebraska, called his talk "keeping family members on friendly terms while farming together."

Throughout his talk Hanson referred to experiences as a consultant, teacher and farmer. He said his meetings with people in the past have been highly emotional at times. A troublesome problem can come when a daughter-in-law enters a farm family, he said.

HANSON AFFECTIONATELY called the daughter-in-law of the farm family the "powder keg." She patiently waits for improvements, such as a better house and more time with her husband. She cooks early and "holds supper late because there's only 10 acres to go." Wives wonder why there is always money for the farm, buy not for her, Hanson said.

Mother and daughter-in-law relationships can become tension filled, according to Hanson. Things build up and a way out is sought. Sometimes it means pressuring the husband to do something, such as look for a new job.

"It is very hard for a young man to get started in farming. The critical starting point is going to be having that family farm to come back to," Hanson said. "The single most important element of that family farm is going to be the willingness of the parents to help."

HANSON SAID parents may have to be willing to share the son's personal costs for a few years until the young farmer is established.

"Never once has any one of my students told me it's economics of farming that drove him off that farm ... it was always the inability of the father and son to get along and work things out together," Hanson said.

"Sometimes when that student of mine is sitting there and he's talking of his experiences with his dad, he starts crying so hard you have to get up and close the door," he said.

Students still hope to farm some day, but not while their father is still there, Hanson added.

He said the fathers are the key to the family farm and that sons have always followed their footsteps. But now things are difficult and the son disagrees with the father. The father wonders where the son's gratitude has gone, and "that is where the problems begin."

The father believes he is being pushed into the back seat, Hanson said. "It takes a lot of patience and understanding between father and son."

He mentioned the problems that the wife and mother must cope with and the loyalty tugs she feels from both husband and son when an argument occurs. "She really walks that narrow path," he said.

HANSON SAID HE tells his students that the parents do not owe them a part of the farm after school. The parents hold the decision to let a younger family member enter the farm, he said. They often feel obligated, he added.

"Communication. It's so easy to talk about, but it's so hard to accomplish," Hanson said. All family members must have mutual respect for each other and cooperate, he added.

"The single hardest thing for a dad to accept is to allow the son to make mistakes." Hanson discouraged fathers from saying "I told you so" too often.

"You have run that farm or ranch like a business and keep the personal lives out of it," Hanson said.

"Too many parents sit down and decide what the kids want. What they should be doing is planning what the parents want," he said.

Hanson also discussed parental decisions on what to do with the farm in the event of a death or divorce. He suggested a will that explains the terms and a good family talk at least once a month to clear the air on what the parents want done and why they want it done that way. Hanson said he has found that money and property disputes or misunderstandings have often split up families.

Basketball walk-ons experience ups, down

By TRACY ALLEN
Collegian Reporter

For junior varsity players Mark Bohm and Sidney Jackson, playing basketball for the K-State Wildcats is like a dream come true.

For those who don't know, Bohm and Jackson are more than just a couple of ordinary basketball players. These two are the key to what makes up the basketball program at K-State, paticularly the junior varsity program.

They go through the same routines as any other player goes through. However, there is one thing different about them. These two are two of the few players who have successfully walked-on to a major college team.

To be a walk-on is like being put through a steaming fire in hopes that one day they would come out in excellent shape. Walk-ons are unique in many ways. They aren't credited with a scholarship nor do they receive as much recognition as the other players do. Besides that, their chances of ever playing on a varsity team is one in a million.

BEING A WALK-ON has its ups and downs. However, for Bohm and Jackson, who also happen to be roommates, their experiences have been worthwhile.

Before college, Bohm had his share of glory as a point guard at Cheney High. In his senior year, he averaged 22 points a game and handed out five assists helping his team to the 1-A state tournament. Not only was he a good shooter averaging 49 percent from the field, but he was also a deadly free throw shooter pumping in 91 percent from the line.

Basketball is normally thought of as a sport for tall men; however, this doesn't hinder the excitement the 5-feet-9½ freshman has for the game nor his desire to tryout for the team.

"I've always enjoyed the game of basketball," Bohm said. "I knew from the beginning that academics weren't the only things I was looking for when I came here."

"True, I am smaller than most of the players in the game," he said. "But I've been working a lot during the off-season in trying to gain more strength in my upper and lower body."

BEING SMALL ISN'T always a disadvantage, Bohm said. "It gives me more of a desire for the game — it makes me work harder."

However, there are disadvantages that go along with being a walk-on, he said.

"For one thing, you don't get a scholarship like all the other players do," Bohm said. "Therefore, you are at a loss when it comes time to finance your way through school."

"Also, you don't get as much recognition as you would like to," he said. "Therefore, that makes it even harder, especially if you're the kind of person who doesn't have very much confidence in himself."

BOHM ADMITTED it was hard for him to fit into the program at first, especially with the adjustment from high school to college. Since he was a starter in high school, he said it was difficult for him to come here and get little playing time.

"I can remember times when I felt frustrated, both before I tried out and afterwards," he said. "However, after being around the team for awhile, I felt like I was a part of the family. All the guys on the team treat me the same as they do everyone else."

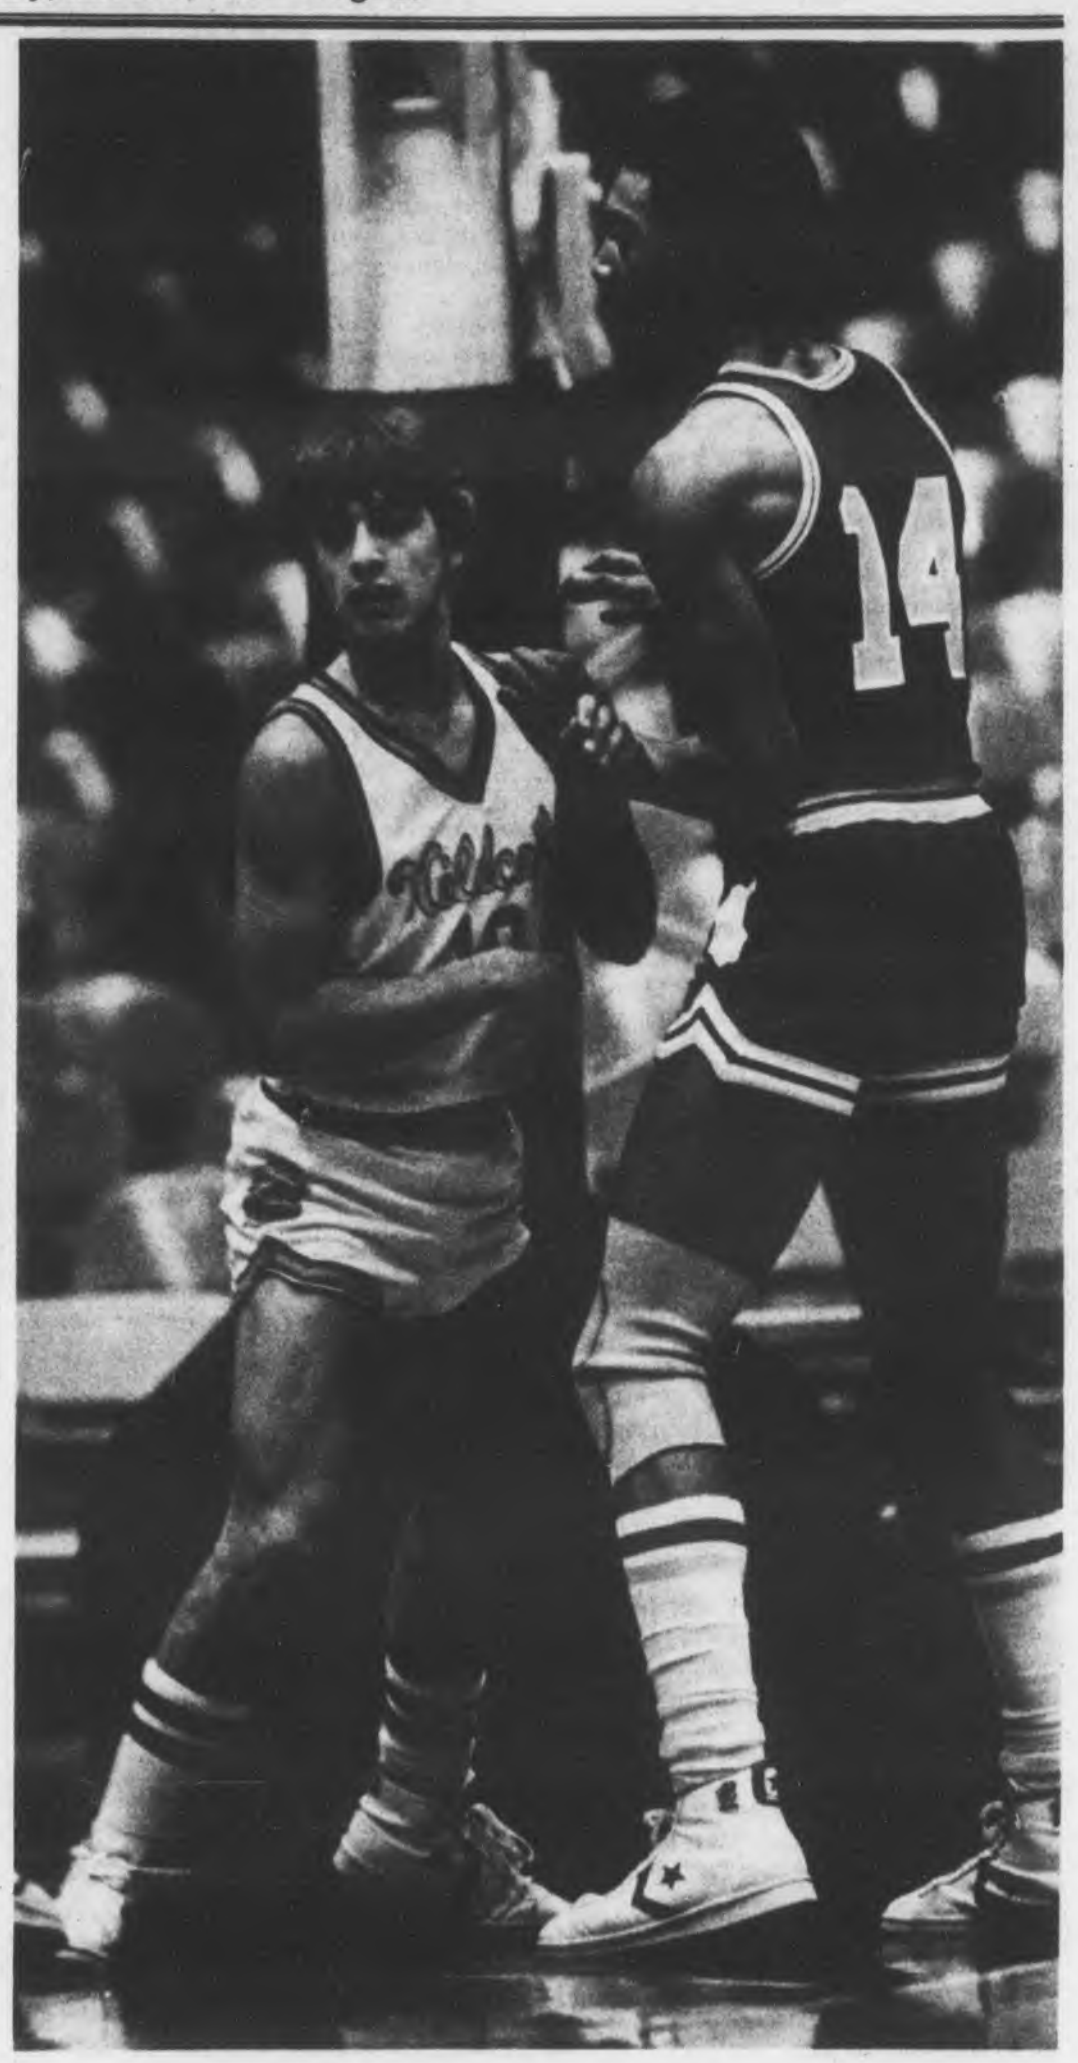
Bohm is like part of the family, junior varsity coach Hank Harris said. "Mark goes through the same things that everyone else goes through. He gets the same treatment whether he's a scholorship player or a walk-on."

HARRIS DESCRIBED BOHM as a "gusty" kid. "Mark is a fighter," he said. "He's a natural born leader in that he knows what needs to be done on the court. He's the kind of guy who can get things started for you."

Besides Bohm, Harris relies on another walk-on, Sidney Jackson.

"Sidney has a lot of potential in becoming a good player some day," he said. "When he's on the court, he makes things look as if it was easy."

A native of Waynesville, Mo., Jackson's chances for a scholarship would have been greater if had played in the same place during his high school career.



During those years, he played for three schools, two in Virginia and one in Missouri. He averaged 15 points a game until his senior year when he pulled a groin muscle.

HIS REASON FOR coming to K-State was more than just basketball. "I knew K-State has a good architecture school and that's part of the reason why I came," he said. "However, since basketball was a part of my life, I decided to give the team a try."

"I knew that I would have played somewhere even if it was at a smaller school," he said. "But I knew I had the talent to play for a larger school. All I needed to do was apply myself to the game."

According to Jackson, he still has a long

'Cats gear up for another bout with Jayhawks

The stage is set for K-State's battle with the University of Kansas. The Wildcats will host the Jayhawks tonight in Ahearn Field House.

The visiting Jayhawks need a win to keep their hopes alive for the NCAA tournament. A loss would not only finish KU's season, but also give the Jayhawks their first losing season since 1973.

K-State, 20-6 in conference play, will be playing in their sixth consecutive first round home court appearance. The Wildcats are the only Big Eight team to accomplish that feat.

The 'Cats defeated Nebraska 67-50 Saturday to close out the conference schedule. The win topped K-State's third consecutive 20-win season.

The Jayhawks were not as successful, falling to Iowa State, 63-61, at home that same afternoon. The 'Hawks are 13-13 for the year and have not won a conference road game this season.

K-State Head Coach Jack Hartman said he expects a good game from both teams.

"I think it will bring out the best in our team and should bring out the best in everybody. KU has the opportunity to salvage a lot of things as a result of this game," Hartman said.

The game also takes on a bit of irony. In KU's last losing season, the teams met three times, once in the Holiday tourney and twice in regular season. The 'Cats captured all three of the contests.

Hartman said that he was pleased with the previous meetings between the intrastate rivals.

"We've played extremely well in the first two games against KU. I'm looking forward to the same type of game," he said.

This year K-State is led in scoring by Tyrone Adams and Randy Reed. The two seniors are scoring 14 points per game for the Wildcats. Ed Nealy is adding 11 points and eight rebounds per game.

KU is paced by David Magley's 17 points and eight boards each game. Tony Guy averages 15 points and Kelly Knight 12 for the Jayhawks.

In the two earlier meetings, K-State won 70-53 at Ahearn Field House and later 63-53 at Lawrence. Adams led the 'Cats with 17 points in the first outing to go with Nealy's 10 rebounds. At Lawrence, Tim Jankovich tallied a season-high 19 points while Nealy pulled down 11 boards.

KU shot 41 percent in the first game and dropped to 31 percent in the second contest.

The Wildcats are gunning for their third Post Season tourney championship while KU is the defending champions. The Jayhawks defeated the 'Cats 80-68 in the final game.

In other first round games, conference winner Missouri hosts Colorado, the last place team in the Big Eight. Oklahoma State travels to Nebraska while Oklahoma hosts Iowa State.

The semi-finals and finals of the tournament will be held Friday and Saturday at Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo.

Walk-ons

way before he achieves any of his goals. "I hope to play varsity ball some day," he said. "However, I don't think that I'm at that point where I can say that I have attained it yet."

"It's easy for me to go around and say that I'm good, but it's another thing to show it. And as far as I'm concerned, I don't think that I have shown it yet."

HEAD COACH JACK Hartman said that he has seen certain strengths develop in each of these players.

"Mark and Sidney are two delightful young men," he said. "I have respect for them because they are hard workers."

Also aiding the junior varsity program are walk-ons; freshmen, Brent Douglas and Brad Carver, sophomore, John Schmidt, and juniors, Hal Bentley and Rick Line.

Walk-ons are not limited to the men's program. The women's basketball team has walk-ons as well. They are Shelly Woodard, Marilee Drouhard and one in particular is Betsy Sloan.

Sloan, a graduate of Salina South, is in a unique situation. She is not only a walk-on but she is also a starter for the women's varsity basketball team.

In her four years at Salina South, Sloan earned numerous awards being named to the all-state, all-city and all-area teams in basketball. She also became the first woman to be awarded the Sportscasters award which recognizes the area's most outstanding athlete.

SLOAN SAID THAT being a walk-on can be rewarding. "I don't know why, but I never thought of myself as a walk-on," she said. "Sure it's hard being a walk-on, but I wouldn't trade it for anything in the world because I learned so much about myself and people."

"It gave me the motivation to work harder than anybody else," she said.

Sloan's choice to try out for the team was reinforced when she attended a summer basketball camp at K-State.

"After going through the camps, I knew that I could play major college ball. I wanted to go somewhere that I could be challenged. Therefore, I felt that playing for a larger school would be more challenging than playing for a junior college."

Sloan sat on the bench for two seasons before starting for K-State.

"For awhile it was hard," she said. " But during those two years, I learned a lot."

"For one thing, you listen and watch everything that happens on the court," Sloan said. "Sitting on the bench gives you a chance to evaluate what's going on. It gives you the opportunity to think about what you would do if you were in the game."

FOR SLOAN, one of her goals is to maintain her starting position. But in order for that to happen, "I'm going to have to work this summer on some of my skills, mainly shooting," she said.

Physical preparation is essential but according to both Jackson and Sloan a player's mental attitude is also important.

"As a walk-on, you need to have a great attitude both toward yourself and others," Sloan said. "When you come into the program, you're already behind everyone else. Therefore, it is vitally important that you have confidence in yourself."

Jackson agrees. "You have got to have a positive attitude if you expect to be successful," he said. "Also, you have to try to work harder than anyone else. Do as much as you can."

As women's coach Lynn Hickey said, "You must be a very special person to be a walk-on. You have to be a giving person. Someone who is sure of himself."

Senate rejects gambling resolution

TOPEKA (AP) — The Kansas Senate overwhelmingly rejected a proposal Tuesday which would have allowed voters to decide whether to legalize pari-mutuel wagering in the state.

On a standing, unrecorded vote, the gambling resolution was killed, 18-21 — nine votes short of the necessary 27 for the two-thirds approval required by both houses to submit proposed constitutional amendments to votes.

The Senate also struck the resolution from its debate calendar following the adverse vote, meaning it cannot be resurrected this session.

The vote, which came after 75 minutes of debate, spelled the end of legislative consideration of the issue in 1982. Even supporters of the proposal conceded it was dead for this year.

"The only resolution left is in the House and the House would have no reason to consider it now," said former Speaker Duane "Pete" McGill, the chief lobbyist for the Kansas Quarterhorse Racing Association, which had pushed the pari-mutuel proposal.

TUESDAY'S VOTE marked the first time in five years that either House of the Legislature had taken a floor vote on a trackside gambling measure.

The last time was in March 1977, when the Senate killed a similar pari-mutuel resolution, also on an unrecorded vote.

This year's proposal, had it been adopted by two-thirds majorities required in both houses, would have placed on the November general election ballot a question of whether to amend the Kansas Constitution to permit pari-mutuel wagering on horse and dog racing.

The Kansas Constitution prohibits lotteries, except for gambling bingo, which was legalized by a vote of the people in 1974.

TRACKSIDE BETTING, under the proposal, would have been on a county option basis, with voter approval needed in each county. All races would have been conducted by licensed nonprofit organizations and a state racing commission would have been created to regulate the racing and gambling operations of the tracks.

Debate was dominated by supporters of the measure, and only two opponents briefly took the floor to urge rejection of the resolution.

Sen. Edward Reilly, (R-Leavenworth), championed the parimutuel measure during floor debate, calling trackside wagering "a hidden gold mine waiting to be discovered."

Reilly said up to $40 million in revenue could be collected each year from the race tracks, and he rejected arguments that the gambling operations would lead to organized crime or law enforcement problems.

REILLY, ALONG with Democratic Sens. Tom Rehorn, Kansas City, and Frank Gaines, Augusta, all appealed to their fellow senators to support the measure, merely as a way to give citizens a chance to vote on the issue.

Rehorn condemned those who opposed putting the pari-mutuel question on the ballot for what he labeled "sheer condescending paternalism" and "tyranny of the legislative process."

"What you're saying are the people of Kansas are stupid, dumb and illiterate," Rehorn said, referring to opponents of pari-mutuel.

AFTER THE vote, McGill said he was not surprised that the resolution got only two-thirds as many votes as needed. He said some senators decided to vote no when it became obvious the 27 votes were not there.

The Rev. Richard E. Taylor Jr., president of Kansans for Life at Its Best, which fought the proposition strongly, said he was pleased the issue was dead for another year.

"The gambling promoters wanted lawmakers to be rubber stamps," said Taylor. "But Kansas senators believe quality of life is more important than millions of dollars in the pockets of gambling promoters."

Kansas House okays compromise, votes today on severance tax bill

See related story, page 13

TOPEKA (AP) — Brushing aside all efforts by opponents to make substantial changes, the Kansas House comfortably gave its tentative approval Tuesday to a compromise bill imposing a 3½ percent severance tax on oil and gas production in the state.

The measure will be up for a final vote Wednesday morning. Based on Tuesday's preliminary count, it should pass the House more easily this year than it did in 1981.

Tuesday's vote advancing the bill to a final roll call was 70-55, or seven votes more than will be needed to give it final House approval.

A coalition of 27 Republicans and 43 Democrats voted for the bill. Voting against it were 45 Republicans and 10 Democrats.

Last year, a bill imposing a 5 percent tax on oil and gas production passed the House with just one vote to spare, 64-61.

IT WAS a gratifying victory for Speaker Wendell Lady, who admitted during debate that he has been ostracized by members of his own Republican Party and subjected to "strained relations with some of my closest friends" because of his promotion of the severance tax, which Democratic Gov. John Carlin also is pushing.

However, after the vote was taken, Lady was not in a bragging mood over his triumph, saying simply, "I'm just pleased with the action of the House of Representatives."

Asked if he expects the vote to be about the same on Wednesday, Lady replied, "I really don't know."

Debate over proposed amendments and the bill itself took nearly five hours Tuesday, with eight of nine proposed amendments rejected.

SEVERANCE TAX supporters scored a smashing victory on the first, major test vote and never let up in ramming through the measure.

An amendment offered by Rep. Keith Farrar (R-Hugoton) was defeated, 50-75, after Lady urged the House to reject all amendments. It would have changed the way a trust fund is to be set up under the plan.

The only amendment which was accepted was offered by Rep. Robert Frey, the House majority leader. It provides for distributing rebates to counties and school districts to compensate for lost property tax revenue on a quarterly basis instead of only twice a year. He tried to make the distribution monthly, but that effort failed.

MAJOR PROPOSED amendments which were rejected were offered by:

—Rep. Bill Fuller (R-Miltonvale), which would have put the severance tax on oil and gas at 2 percent and increased the state's 3 percent sales tax to 3½ percent. It was defeated, 41-83.

—Rep. LeRoy Fry (D-Little River), which would have removed the 2½ percent tax on natural gas liquids from the bill. It lost, 52-70.

—Rep. Gerald Friedeman (R-Great Bend), which would have eliminated a 5 percent rebate to counties and school districts and created a local property tax reduction fund into which 60 percent of the revenue from the severance tax, to guarantee most

Airline industry faces cloudy skies

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Continental Airlines' directors met Tuesday to try to stave off bankruptcy, but Continental's misery was not unique in an industry reeling from two troubled years and losses of a half-billion dollars.

Continental, the nation's 10th largest airline, has $200 million in debt that could come due at any moment. Its management was trying to come up with a plan to keep it going.

Braniff International and World Airways also had gloomy news.

Braniff said its employees would receive only half their usual pay on Thursday, in what the money-losing airline described as a one-shot, one-week deferral that will give it $8 million in short-term cash.

World, which started discount transcontinental service in 1980, said it could collapse within a week unless it gets concessions from employees, banks and its landlord, the Port of Oakland, Calif.

Overall, major U.S. airlines lost more than $225 million in 1980 and $300 million in 1981, according to the Air Transport Association — with the list of losers ranging from international aviation pioneer Pan American World Airways to new entrants that spread their wings in the deregulated skies opened by President Carter's administration.

Among major airlines, Pan Am posted the biggest loss for 1981 — $348 million. United Air Lines, the nation's largest carrier, reported losses of $148.8 million.

Delta Air Lines, American Airlines and USAir were the only major airlines to turn profits, with Delta leading the industry with net income of $91.6 million.

Money-losing airlines have blamed back-to-back recessions, fuel prices and fare wars they could not ignore.

Continental's board met in Los Angeles after the airline said it failed to win relief from its labor unions.

"The board of directors is receiving a report from top management and should give management instructions on what it wants done," Continental spokesman Bruce Plowman said.

But he said it was uncertain what decisions, if any, would come out of the session.

The meeting came less than a week after Continental's auditors said they would qualify their certification of the airline's 1981 financial statement with a clause questioning the company's ability to survive.

Continental, which lost $60 million last year, has a total indebtedness of about $200 million after borrowing $25 million last month, Plowman said. The loss would have been more than $100 million had the line not gained $40 million on the sale of aircraft and tax credits.

Continental has asked three unions — the Union of Flight Attendants, the Air Line Pilots Association and the International Association of Machinists — for wage and work-rule concessions that would save the company an estimated $60 million annually.

But negotiations are in preliminary stages, and not even a tentative agreement has been worked out, company and union officials said.

Police question motives in Olathe killing

OLATHE — A set of missing bank keys has provided the only possible motive for the weekend beating death of an Olathe bank official, authorities say.

Yet police investigators question whether the theft of the keys was the real reason David J. Harmon, 25, was slain early Sunday in a bedroom of his duplex home.

Harmon's wife, Melinda, 24, told police two men entered the home about 4 a.m. Sunday and demanded the keys. After she gave them the keys, she said, they knocked her unconscious.

When she regained consciousness, police said, she ran next door and summoned police, who found Harmon, still in bed, beaten to death with a "hard, round instrument."

Vernon Wilson, a Kansas City police detective acting as a spokesman for the major case squad, said investigators had determined no definite motive for the slaying.

"Why would someone steal keys to the bank on Sunday morning" he asked. "Still, there's nothing in his (Harmon's) background to indicate someone would want to kill him."

Doctors suspect medication in Virginia deaths

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — A commercially produced cream used to fight infection in burn victims may have killed nine patients at the University of Virginia Medical Center over a two-year period, university physicians say.

The substance, Furacin Soluble Dressing, can cause acute kidney failure, Dr. Benjamin C. Sturgill, professor of pathology in the University of Virginia School of Medicine, told the United States-Canadian Division of the Internationl Academy of Pathology in Boston on Monday.

The university's burn center used the cream on patients between July 1978 and July 1980 before discontinuing its use, Sturgill said. Ten patients died during that time, and clinical observations, laboratory tests and autopsies indicated that nine of the patients, with burns over 15 to 64 percent of their bodies, had a toxic syndrome similar to that produced by drinking standard antifreeze.

Jury convicts Wichita man of killing daughter

WICHITA — Joe Smith, 24, of Wichita, has been convicted of second-degree murder in the November death of his month-old daughter.

Smith wept as the Sedgwick County District Court jury announced its verdict Monday.

He testified in his own defense saying he had shaken the child in attempt to get her to laugh. Prosecutors said Smith became angry when his daughter cried and thought force would quiet her. An autopsy showed the child died of two separate brain injuries. The baby also had 16 breaks in its ribs.

Judiciary committee OKs strict sentencing bill

TOPEKA — A tough criminal sentencing bill which would further crowd the state's correctional facilities was passed by the House Judiciary Committee Tuesday.

The measure goes against the pleas of a special prison building committee to avoid passing legislation increasing inmate population unless facilities are available.

Ironically that warning and the stiffer sentences are both largely the responsibility of Rep. Joe Hoagland, (R-Overland Park).

The sentencing bill, drafted largely by Hoagland, increases the range on minimum mandatory sentences on criminal offenses.

Those changes, if approved by the Legislature, would result in dramatic increases in the prison population as inmates serve longer sentences.

The Department of Corrections estimated the "minimum possible impact" of the bill would increase the inmate population by 1,811 over the next 25 years.

Congress tables agency's furniture spending

WASHINGTON — Saying the purchase of more than $150,000 in furnishings for members of the Federal Labor Relations Authority apparently violates federal rules, a federal official has asked congressional investigators to look into the deal.

Gerald Carmen, administrator of the General Services Administration, the government's housekeeping arm, said "the FLRA clearly failed to follow the regulations on furniture purchases" when it recently bought the sumptuous furnishings for the authority's three members.

Sen. John Danforth (R-Mo.), had complained to Carmen about the purchases, which came at a time when the federal labor agency was firing 47 workers to cut costs. The furniture included two $1,712 Barcelona chairs and a $3,785 conference table with two matching $2,047 credenzas for FLRA chairman Ronald Haughton.

Carmen pointed out in a letter to Danforth that regulations call for agencies to purchase "the minimum quantity and quality of property necessary to support the mission of the agency."

Weather

It looks like March is going to come in like a lion after all. Today's weather will be colder with snow likely by tonight. Highs in the low 20s. Continued cold with a chance of snow Thursday, highs around 40.

Betting may help state finances

The Kansas House killed a resolution Tuesday which would have introduced a bill to legalize parimutuel betting in the state.

Although this points up the opposition to the matter of legalized gambling, legislators and their constituents should not allow this bill, or similar measures, to die.

With the proposed "New Federalism," Kansas and other states must find new ways to finance the programs that are being turned over to state control.

Parimutuel betting could greatly increase the state's revenue, and would be more acceptable to most than would be an increase in taxes.

Taking the phone off the hook

The recent ruling calling for the breakup of American Telephone and Telegraph, and the subsequent raise in phone bills, may result in some individuals giving up their ability to reach out and touch someone.

But for those willing to pay for the convenience of Alexander Graham Bell's invention but unwilling to let just anyone with a phone or a dime reach out and touch or interrupt their lives, there is good news.

The Kansas City Star recently spotlighted an hearing- and nerve-saving device on display at a telecommunication trade show, the PriveCode. This device "means never having to say 'hello'...unless you want to," according to a company ad. The PriveCode answers each phone call by asking the caller to enter a three-digit personal access code provided by the phone owner. If the caller enters a correct code, then the phone will ring and signal that the voice on the other end is not a salesman, wrong number or a busybody neighbor.

This development can undo the convenience, particularly in emergencies, that can at times be a nuisance. What the answering service does for those away from home, the PriveCode may do for those at home.

Status quo acceptable

Editor,

After reading Kelly Blair's March 2 editorial, I would like to clarify something about Puerto Rico. The fact that there are revolutionary movements which support the independence of Puerto Rico from the United States, does not mean that Puerto Ricans want to be an independent republic.

The independence movements in Puerto Rico have decreased from 45 percent of the population in 1950 to five percent in 1980. The statehood movement has increased from 30 percent of the population in 1960 to about 45 percent in 1980.

When we said that the majority of Puerto Ricans don't want to be a state, we refer to the fact that about 50 percent of the population support our present status of commonwealth and territory of the United States of America.

Since many Americans are not aware of these facts, the idea that Puerto Ricans don't want to be a state may confuse people, giving them the idea that we want to be an independent republic.

Hopefully, a few years from now we will be proud to place the 51st star in our flag of the United States of America.

Striving for the non-existent 'best'

"Beav, all we can ask of you is what you have to give. Son, just do your best." — Ward Cleaver, in "Leave It To Beaver."

I, like many other children in the Hard Work belt of the farming Midwest, was raised on the philosophy of a "personal best," the belief of giving all you've got to whatever you're doing — really very nice in theory, but utter insanity in practice. This philosophy germinated with my grim determination to stay within the lines of my Malibu Barbie coloring book, flourished through the long speeches of leisure-suited, BIG-gestured speakers who were imported from Oklahoma and brought to our tiny junior high graduation to Inspire and Influence, and culminated with a startling revelation on the final page of William Danforth's I Dare You!, an autobiography of the Ralston-Purina Company's founder and his version of how through gut determination he transformed himself from a sickly, effeminate boy to the bullish president with pep. It's probably the only book published which had the entirety of its sales gift-wrapped. Why didn't anyone want to read it themselves?

I'VE DECIDED that personal best is a crock.

No one has ever reached his personal best. It's as elusive and suicidal as Wiley Coyote's quest of the Road Runner.

What! Saying that there is no personal best, that no one can ever achieve his potential, is like not eating the birthday cake that Mother made for you — from scratch — because it's a disgusting heap of sugar, saturated fats, and calories.

It's pessimistic, skeptical and downright crabby.

"Do your best with what you have and no one can ask any more," may be a wonderful thing to tell your grandchildren when you're feeling particularly wise. Or is it?

CONSIDER THE FOLLOWING. All is within the realm of the average person, (though some people have the resources to excel past even the modest examples I put forth here). Giving 100 percent, really and truly 100 percent, of what's in you is lunacy, whether it is applied to studying for an exam, playing racketball or cleaning a john.

It is beginning the studying for the next exam immediately after the taking of the last one, a study period of a good four weeks. It is reading 12 chapters as many times as Ronald Reagan made film flops and listening to the lectures you taped while you munch your Raisin Bran, fix your lunch and put on your pajamas, if you wear them. That is doing your best.

IT IS RUNNING 10 miles a day before the racquetball match, eating a diet so well-balanced that it would make the U.S. Food and Drug Administration's collective hair stand on end, getting at last nine hours of sleep a night (when you should be studying for your exam) and then slipping a few uppers into your Gatorade as you step upon the court. That's giving it your all.

It's not only sterilizing the toilet with a cotton swab doused in Sani-flush, but also taking a bacteria count on the porcelain and doing water analysis. That's taking what you've got and doing your best with it.

What's wrong with an A-, a 21-7 game and a commode that's only well-scrubbed? Why do we insist upon staring at the missing 10 percent in the face and ignoring the other 90 percent like an overdue library book? It's the principle behind perfectionists, procrastinators and people with rotten self-images.

PERFECTIONISTS are obvious. They're the ones holding the Sani-flush drenched Q-tips in their hands.

A true disciple of this doctrine is the attractive girl who looks in the mirror, ruefully disregarding the 90 percent of her body, which is a knockout, and complaining about the other 10 percent of it, her nose, which is not.

People who put things off do it for different reasons. Absolutely despising what you have to do is one very good one, but others put things off because they're afraid they'll do a job that's not up to par and by doing it at the last minute, they have a handy excuse for less than perfection. The old why-don't-I-just-do-it-and-get-it-over-with ploy.

Expecting your "personal best" is silly. A personal "very good" is commendable. No one can live up to his potential because once he lives up to it, it is potential no longer.

Moore to head veterinary medicine college

The Department of Laboratory Medicine in the College of Veterinary Medicine will have a new department head, effective July 1, 1982.

Dr. William Moore, professor of clinical pathology, will succeed Dr. E. H. Coles, current head of the laboratory medicine department.

Moore joined the faculty in 1969 after serving as director of the clinical pathology service of the Animal Health Center, New York City. He holds his bachelor's of science and DVM degrees from the University of Minnesota. He also is a diplomate in Clinical Pathology in the American College of Veterinary Pathology.

Moore has had practical experience in Massachusetts and at the University of Minnesota, in addition to his New York assignment. At K-State he has been director of the Clinical Pathology Laboratory and has served as assistant head, and acting head, of the department.

Coles, former department head, requested to be relieved of his administrative duties. He will remain on the faculty.

Toxicology society elects Oehme president

Members of the Society of Toxicology, an international organization, have elected Dr. Frederick Oehme, professor of toxicology, medicine and physiology, as president of the organization.

Oehme will be heading the largest toxicological organization in the world.

The purpose of the Society of Toxicology is to promote knowledge of toxicology and facilitate information exchange among members and other scientific disciplines, Oehme said.

Oehme was recently elected to the Academy of Toxicological Sciences, and is vice president of the World Federation of Clinical Toxicology Centers and Poison Control Centers. He is diplomate of the American Board of Toxicological Sciences and the American Board of Veterinary Toxicology, founding and current editor of "Veterinary and Human Toxicology" and former president of the Academy of Clinical Toxicology.

Oehme, a member of the faculty since 1959, also consults for various governmental, scientific and industrial groups.

Chemical engineering professors get patents

Patents were recently issued to two professors from the Department of Chemical Engineering.

L.T. Fan, head of the department, received a patent on a method for treatment of wastewater. A process to manufacture gasohol resulted in a patent for Benjamin Kyle, professor of chemical engineering.

Fan's process, developed with Chin-Yung Wen of the University of West Virgina, is patented under the title, "Methods for Wastewater Treatment in Fluidized Bed Biological Reactors." It involves the use of a two-layered "bed" containing bacteria which causes a biological reaction on the wastewater.

Fan and Wen currently hold three patents on related processes using a semi-fluidized bed, and a fourth is pending.

Kyle's patent, titled "Low-Energy Process of Producing Gasoline-Ethanol Mixtures," covers a process in which gasoline is used as a solvent to produce gasohol directly by extracting alcohol from aqueous solution.

Both patents have been assigned to the Research Foundation. The foundation therefore holds the rights to the processes and can issue licenses for their use, with the foundation and the inventors sharing in income from royalties.

Graduate establishes business scholarships

A 1979 graduate, Melodia Dooling, has established scholarships to aid K-State students who are graduated from Blue Valley High School.

The three $500 scholarships' recipients will be selected by the General Scholarship Committee. The only stipulation is that the students must be enrolled in the College of Business Administration, and must be from Blue Valley High School..

"It's very unusual for such a recent graduate to establish a scholarship," Art Loub, executive vice president of the KSU Foundation, said. "Miss Dooling has certainly set a high standard of philanthropic initiative for other recent graduates to follow."

Dooling graduated from Blue Valley High School at Stanley.

Division appoints conference coordinators

The Division of Continuing Education has appointed two conference coordinators, Carol Smith and Karen Keller.

Smith was director of outreach for the University for Man before being named to the conference post. She has a B.A. in speech and drama from the University of Missouri.

Keller was a Title IX specialist in the Midwest Sex Desegregation Assistance Center in the College of Education before joining the conference office. She has B.S. and M.S. degrees from K-State.

One of Smith's first major assignments will be coordinating the Folk Life Festival which will be held in Manhattan May 1-2. Among Keller's assignments will be the coordination of the K-State Family Camp to be held at Rock Springs, July 23-25.

Commission to focus on city developments

Due to the fact that city commisioners did not meet Tuesday night, as regularly scheduled, the commission will hold a special meeting at 7 Wednesday night. The regularly scheduled meeting was cancelled because it lacked a quorum.

Mayor Russell Reitz and Commissioners Dave Fiser and Eugene Klingler have been attending the National League of Cities Congress in Washington. The local officials were expected to meet with Sen. Nancy Kassebaum (R-Kan.), Rep. Jim Jeffries (R-Atchison), and a spokesman for Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kan.), as well as HUD officials. Manhattan officials will tell Washingto officials of new developments taking place in the city.

In city business, the mayor and city clerk are scheduled to:

— Consider entering into an agreement with Kansas Park and Resources Authority for Annual Operation and Maintenance Assurance for the City Park Swimming Pool Renovation.

— Receive a report from Fire Chief William Smith regarding a recent study conducted by the Insurance Services Office.

— Consider adopting a Resolution authorizing the issuance of $425,000 in Industrial Revenue Bonds for the construction of a building at the corner of Humboldt and Juliette to be used by Varney, Mills, Rogers, Burnett and Associates.

— Accept the city engineer's estimate, review bids, and award a contract for the Knoxberry Addition Sanitary Sewer and Water Improvements.

Sisters play country Nooner with fiddle, fun, 'folksiness'

By TANYA BRANSON
Staff Writer

A drawn-out liquid drawl that one would expect out of Nashville poured from the lips of Sheila and Sharon Brennan at the Nooner Tuesday. Surprisingly the siblings aren't from the hotbed of country and western, but from St. Marys, and that twangy whine comes from a love their father has for country music.

Coming on stage wearing cowboy belts, boots, Levi's and western shirts, the Brennan's prepared the audience for country — what the audience wasn't prepared for was the homestyle type of entertaining the two would spin.

The audience took a hint it wasn't a formal Nooner when the sisters decided what to play over the mikes — "What do you want to do? Um, Patsy Klein? Yeah, fine."

After a couple of renditions of old country star Klein, Sharon asked, "I'm going to play my fiddle now, is that OK?" The audience was won over, the fiddle was fine with them, and the Catskeller was more like someone's living room where everyone was sitting around, singing along and shooting the breeze.

THE FIDDLE, their dad's grandpa's fiddle, took on the wisdom of the years when Sharon, freshman in pre-design professions, slid her fingers over the strings. Sheila is a freshman in agriculture.

"Sharon, play 'Orange Blossom Special'."

"No, are you trying to embarrass me, Sheila, as if I wasn't enough."

A Don Williams and Emmylou Harris tune, "If I needed you," gave the Brennans a chance to belt out their harmony in a country song which, like most country songs, told of love found or lost.

The conversation interrupting the songs sparked back and forth between the sisters as they bickered, laughed and talked as only sisters can. The Brennans' sarcastic, laid-back humor made the audience feel like it must have known the two sisters before.

"Play 'Orange Blossom Special,' Sharon."

"No, Sheila, this is Willie Nelson."

SNAPPING FINGERS and clapping hands of country-western enthusiasts in the audience accompanied "Stay all Night, Stay a Little Longer." The mood stayed upbeat when Sharon demonstrated more talent on her father's mandolin.

"My dad taught us all this," Sharon said. "My grandma taught us some too. My family is musical — both sides — and we have grown up around music."

The next song wasn't all there because bursts of laughter from the sisters and the audience kept interrupting the slightly off-beat words. The title tells all: "You Can't Roller Skate in a Buffalo Herd." The laughter gives the audience insight on what the Brennan's dad used to sing to them when they were small and easily amused.

"Sharon, 'Orange Blossom Special'?"

"No, Sheila, this one is dad's song. He thinks it's a good song and so do I."

AN ANDY SCHOTTISCH song, which Sharon said hardly anyone knew, brought back what Sheila calls "the little get-togethers with my dad's friends and clients who all know the songs we play and sing along."

Five minutes left. The audience is crying for "Orange Blossom Special." "Sheila, I really didn't think you'd do this to me. I'm not mad, but I hope your fingers get tired."

But first a Bob Wills tune and another called "Steel Guitar Rag." The fiddle was warmed up and the fingers were ready to fly.

"Orange Blossom Special." One can't be considered a fiddle player until he or she can master "Orange Blossom Special." Sharon mastered it and Sheila accompanied until her fingers were worn out.

The speed of the fingers and the whirl of the fiddle spun the room faster and faster until Sharon's intense concentration broke into a smile. She glanced at her sister, "Don't stop playing. We're going to keep going because I'm having fun now."

Reagan directs warning toward 'hand-wringers'

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) — President Reagan vowed no retreat Tuesday from his tax cuts and Pentagon buildup, saying the alternatives advanced by critics are "designed to save certain legislators' political hides rather than saving the economy."

The president didn't name names, but his complaint was aired in the home state of a fellow conservative Republican, Sen. Pete V. Domenici, who has declared Reagan's budget deficits unacceptable and proposed a counterplan which has attracted keen interest from leaders of both parties.

Reagan, at an earlier stop in Cheyenne, Wyo., complained that Washington "seems paralyzed by hand-wringers" over the record red ink in his own program.

The president assailed what he termed "the born-again budget balancers" and the "pessimists on the Potomac" during a campaign stop for Sen. Malcolm Wallop (R-Wyo.) enroute to New Mexico and a California vacation.

Speaking to about 4,000 Wallop supporters who paid $10 each to cram into a high school gymnasium, Reagan declared that "As the volume of voices rises in debate, there is one thing I want to make very clear: My commitment to cutting taxes and rebuilding our defenses is every bit as strong today as it was the day I took office."

And he insisted his budget program, despite deficits widely projected at over $100 billion in the coming years, will "guide our country out of this dark tunnel of recession and decline."

"Others say the way to balance the budget is to cut back on defense," Reagan said. "This is the one subject on which the man holding the job I hold is practically the only one who has all the facts with regard to our national security. We dare not reduce our defense budget ... I don't think Americans want their armed forces held together with chewing gum and baling wire."

In Albuquerque, Reagan declared at a similar rally, attended by some 2,500 supporters of Sen. Harrison Schmitt, that "As much as I detest the idea of deficits, as president I must accept a large deficit if

School budget cuts get low marks from House

WASHINGTON (AP) — House Republicans balked at President Reagan's school budget cuts on Tuesday as Education Secretary T.H. Bell conceded that the quality of education for disadvantaged youths would slip under the program.

"Many of these proposals I can't support," declared Rep. John Ashbrook of Ohio, ranking Republican on the House Education and Labor Committee. He specifically assailed cuts in vocational education and education for the handicapped, vowing they are "decisions that will have rough sledding."

Ashbrook also said his "main concern is that Republican members had minimal impact — next to no impact — on the decisions that are being made."

And Rep. Lawrence DeNardis (R-Conn.) told Bell, "I disagree with almost everything in the budget as written. I don't know of anybody on this committee — save one or two possibly — who could support the budget you submitted. You're going to have to resign yourself to the fact that this budget is going to be rewritten."

Rep. Marge Roukema (R-N.J.) said people in her district "are absolutely appalled at the depth of the proposed cuts for guaranteed student loans and the Pell grants" for needy students.

She said "it is quite doubtful any changes can be made above and beyond what was done last year in the student loan program."

And Rep. William Goodling (R-Pa.) told Bell, "we can't afford the defense budget at the expense of the education budget."

Asked by Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-Calif.) if the quality of education for disadvantaged children can be maintained with a 23 percent cut in funding, Bell conceded it could not.

"I couldn't make that claim," Bell said. "When you reduce funding, you sacrifice as far as quality is concerned."

The administration budget proposal cuts federal education funds from about $13 billion to $10 billion and reduces the Education Department to a foundation.

Acknowledging that the Title I program for educating disadvantaged children "has been a successful program," Bell said he felt he had no choice but to reduce funding for it to $1,900,000 because of overall budget constraints.

The proposed cut would reduce spending from $525 per student to $400, he said. "I don't want to say I've found a magical solution," he added, but "we do know of programs that are successful at the $400-a-child level."

Bell said in his prepared testimony: "We anticipate that many of these reductions in federal funds will be partially offset by increased state, local and individual contributions that will be possible if a revitalized economy improves tax bases for property, sales and state income taxes by 1983 and school year 1983-84. Of the $181 billion spent nationally on education, only about 10 percent comes directly from the federal government."

Students, senators talk on agriculture issues

By TODD DOMER
Collegian Reporter

A group of 32 Agricultural Student Council members got a taste of some state government views Tuesday in Topeka.

The trip, sponsored by the Elanco Products Company, and led by Larry Erpelding, assistant director of resident instruction in agriculture, originated at the Union early Tuesday morning and was destined for the state capitol building.

Upon arrival the group was hurried off to a committee room where students were first addressed by Sen. Fred Kerr (R-Pratt). Kerr introduced the group to the issues to be considered in this legislative session dealing in agricultural concerns.

"You can't build a fence around the state of Kansas, solve the problem here, and think that it's going to work," said Kerr, chairman of the Senate Agriculture and Livestock Committee.

KERR STATED that the problem was national in scope and that his group tried to study the Kansas farm economy by boiling down the problem.

"We decided to try to do a better job of promoting and finding exports as well as educating people," Kerr said.

"We are now trying to pass a one mill levy on each of the four main grains in the state (wheat, grain sorghum, corn and soybean) with the revenue being used for further education," he said.

The main reason representatives are pushing passage of the levy, was because the International Grains Program at K-State would have funding to improve techniques and facilities, Kerr said.

"Foreign grain milling teams come to Manhattan and take courses in how to use our high quality wheat and in turn these people make the decisions about buying the wheat when they get back to their own country," Kerr said in reference to foreign students coming from India, Mexico, Nigeria, the Phillipines and several other countries. This bill is currently on the House floor but has not been introduced, he added.

"Another issue at hand at the current time is the passing of a Warehousing Law, which is being discussed by the Senate Committee," he said. The law involves handling bankruptcies on wheat that is being stored.

KERR ALSO spoke briefly of several items which were to be discussed on the floor Tuesday, including both the severance tax issue and parimutuel racing bill.

"Any connection (agreement) between both sides of the severance tax bill seem extremely remote at this time," Kerr said. The bill would tax oil and gas at the wellhead with only royalty owners absorbing the cost.

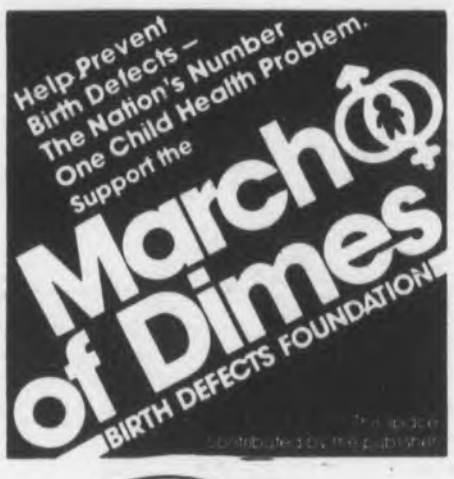
Students were rushed to the second speaker, Dave Bennett, executive secretary of the Cow-calf/Stocker Division of the Kansas Livestock Association (KLA). Bennett also serves as a lobbyist for the association.

"Young people should get involved with some association," Bennett said. Bennett is a graduate of K-State.

He stressed the need for students to keep in touch with legislators by joining one of the many agricultural associations.

"Credibility is very important," he said refering to the relationship between himself, his constituents and the legislators he works with.

"The number one job of the lobbyist is to act as an information type person," Bennett said in presenting a view somewhat different from that which Kerr presented.



BENNETT REPRESENTS 7,000 KLA members from throughout the state and is one of about 50 lobbyists who work on a full-time basis. The general attitude of KLA members is anti-government subsidies like those grain producers currently receive, he said.

"I've sold a lot of bills that I didn't agree with, so to be a lobbyist I think you have to be responsive to your members through their input," Bennett said. He added that legislators appreciate lobbyists for keeping them informed on the seemingly endless list of bills they confront.

Following this information session, the group was off to the governor's office for pictures with Governor John Carlin.

Later the students walked to the Merchants National Bank where Sr. Vice President Wilbur Levering gave them a banker's perspective of agricultural issues.

"I think we fully well need to know about the legislative process because we will soon be graduating and should be aware of these things," Greg Fowler, senior in chemical engineering, said.

Analysts predict Senate tax vote: too close to call

TOPEKA (AP) — As the House debated its severance tax bill Tuesday, objective sources who are keeping a close tally on that issue in the Senate said it is a dead heat whether the upper legislative chamber would approve such a bill — given the chance.

It may never come to a straight up-or-down vote in the Senate, because of the opposition of President Ross Doyen and Majority Leader Bob Talkington.

But if it does, it would be too close to call at the present time, so evenly divided are the senators, these sources said.

"It is hanging by a thread," said a Republican senator opposed to the severance tax.

"A good, hard look at it tells me the votes are there for it, if it can get to the floor of the Senate," said a Democrat who is pushing the tax.

An Associated Press count shows 17 senators presently are solid yes votes, 17 are regarded as unbending no votes and six could go either way when — and if — the Senate roll is called later in the session.

Severance tax opponents believe they have it blocked on at least a 20-20 tie, even if the issue comes to a clear-cut vote in the Senate.

Since Doyen is sure to assign all severance tax bills to both the Assessment and Taxation and the Ways and Means Committees, there is strong doubt the measures could win endorsement of both panels and go to the Senate for routine debate and a vote.

There likely will have to be parliamentary manuevering to try to bring the severance tax issue to a vote of the full Senate. It could easily die on a vote to decide whether to uphold one of Doyen's rulings from the chair.

The AP tally was compiled from talking with individual senators and from counts constantly being taken and updated by those in both political parties and on both sides of the issue.

It shows 10 Democrats and seven Republicans are supporting the severance tax, while 13 Republicans and four Democrats are aligned against it.

In the middle are four Republicans and two Democrats.

Opponents need woo just half of the six to defeat the tax, on a tie vote. Supporters must corral four to get it passed.

Chairing Senate hectic but fulfilling for Dodds

At the core of K-State's student governing system is an individual responsible for presiding over all Student Senate meetings, serving as chairman of the Senate Executive Committee, preparing an agenda for each senate meeting and excusing senators from senate meetings. The student? It's the Student Senate Chairman.

Doug Dodds, senior in political science, has just completed his term as senate chairman.

Jokingly Dodds said, "I'd be tempted to say it's a $1.98 job I'd never want to do again. I have enjoyed it and I have hated it at times. People, though, were the single biggest plus.

"The key thing is to see that everyone knows what is going on. You have to be sensitive to all the needs." The senate chair is "the individual that has to insure the smooth running of senate," Dodds said.

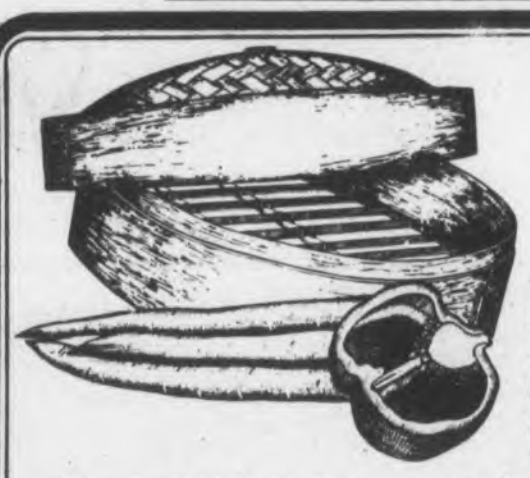
To be effective Dodds said, "I think you have to be a friend first. You have to provide encouragement and incentive. I do what I think is right. I do the best that I can. Whether or not it's a good job is up to others to decide. I've got a job to do. I enjoy doing it."

Dodds said the job takes time and effort.

"I feel like you need to spend a terrific amount of time at it. The biggest thing is to play by the rules. If you are not careful then you run the risk of denying an individual the right to say what they have to say. You run the risk of poor legislation. You run the risk of making someone mad."

Dodds said the job helped him grow. "The things I have learned will be of great value in the future. Student senate is a wonderful educational opportunity. It gives students the opportunity to have an impact."

His advice for Geri Greene, newly elected senate chairman and junior in journalism and mass communications, is: "I would hope that (Geri) would spend time getting to the tremendous, unlimited potential of those in senate."



Greene said her main goal as senate chairman is to "promote strength and unity in senate and to provide some experience. I want to work toward resolving student concerns in all areas."

When asked what changes she would make Greene said, "It's really kind of a hard thing to change all at once. I do hope to keep more accurate minutes of senate executives and other comittee meetings."

She said her main qualification for the job was her experience as senate vice chairman last year. She has been a senator for two years.

"Learning and knowing about the University helps with this job," Greene said.

Greene said she hoped her experience and Bill Rogenmoser's fresh approach to student government would complement each other. Rogenmoser, senior in secondary science education, is Student Body President.

Wildcat Ed Nealy and Coach Jack Hartman try to get the attention of a player in the final moments of the game against the Jayhawks.

K-State's Les Craft wheels toward the basket under close pressure of Jayhawk Kelly Knight early in the second-half of Tuesday night's game.

'Cats defeat Jayhawks, head for Kansas City

There they were, playing their last game in Ahearn Field House, with arch-rival Kansas warming up in the forecourt.

Four K-State seniors loped onto the wooden floor to collect just a few more memories from a basketball shrine.

And right from the beginning, the Wildcats took full charge of their destiny in the opening round of the Big Eight post season Tournament. Randy Reed set the pace for a trip to Kansas City this weekend. His 24 points along with 17 from Tyrone Adams propelled the Wildcats into the semifinal round, and completed the first three-game sweep of the Jayhawks since the 1976-77 season. K-State romped the 'Hawks 74-62.

Reed took charge of his game right from the beginning. After Ed Nealy grabbed the tip, he passed to Reed at the top of the key. Reed gave Jeff Dishman of Kansas a fake, drove in the lane, and swished home a 10-foot jumper.

"I think the team came ready to play tonight," Reed said. "We wanted to go to Kansas City pretty bad."

Kansas Head Coach Ted Owens put a little twist into the starting lineup. Sharpshooter Tyke Peacock began the contest ahead of regular Tad Boyle.

PEACOCK WAS no disappointment. The 6-1 junior found his favorite spot from deep in the right corner, and led Kansas in scoring with 18 points.

With 19:16 left in the first half, Peacock tied the game at 2-2 with a 15-foot jumper. Nealy answered seconds later, taking an Adams assist to the hoop.

Magley connected for Kansas the next time down with a 15-footer from the left baseline.

Adams hit a 15-footer of his own at the 15:21 mark. Nealy grabbed a Tim Jankovich missed shot and dropped it in for a score the next time down. This made put the 'Cats up 10-6 with 15 minutes left in the first stanza.

With the score tied at 19 the 'Cats then reeled off six unanswered points of their own. Nealy capped a seven-point lead, converting on Adams' assist with a layup at the 7:24 remaining to pu the Wildcats up 25-19.

Kansas played the 'Cats in a man-to-man defense, but K-State's front line proved to be a little overbearing for Owens's strategy.

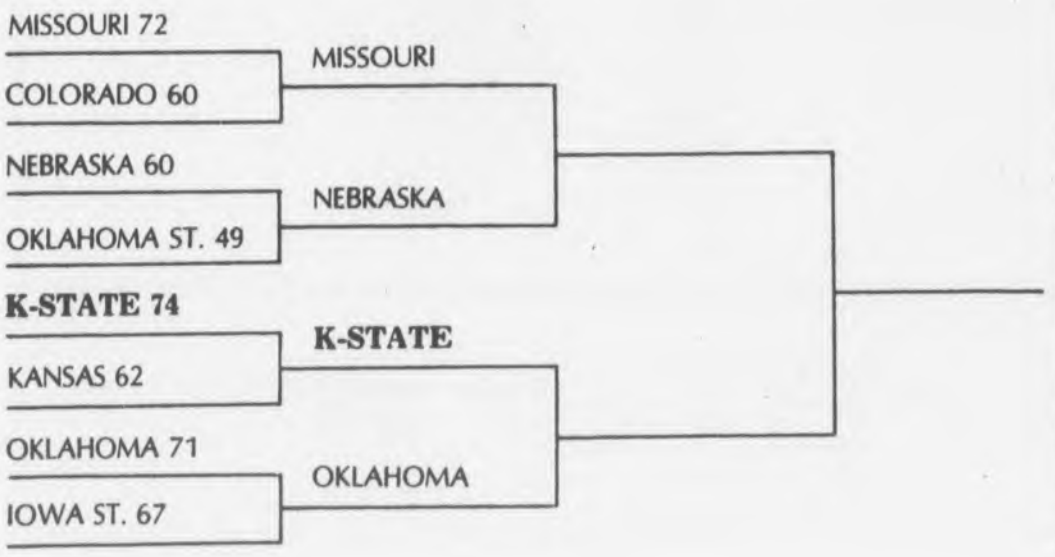
"I wanted to come out in a man-to-man defense and stop K-State," Owens said. "but we never had the lead or the ball in a tie game in order for us to take control. We turned the ball over in crucial situations, and especially during out transition game."

THE REMAINDER of the first half was a shooting match as both teams traded scores until the end. Kelly Knight's 10-foot turnaround with 51 ticks on the clock, left the score 38-28 at the half.

K-State's Les Craft was very stingy on the boards in the first half. At 6-10, the junior center was not to be taken lightly by anyone. On the game, he recorded four blocked shots and 14 points.

Head Coach Jack Hartman said Craft has reached new heights in his play.

"Sometimes all of a sudden the things a kid wants to do starts falling into place," Hartman said. "Les' progress s been very important to us."



Knight picked up where he left off as the second half got under way. Another turnaround jumper cut the K-State lead to eight points with 19:27 to play.

Reed then sank one of two freethrows on a foul by Brian Martin. Then the focus went to Adams of the 'Cats and Peacock of the 'Hawks.

With 16:27 remaining, Peacock found an opening for a layup, but Craft rejected the attempt. Adams rose to the occassion with a 17-footer. The two traded the spotlight until the 14:22 mark when Craft hit a shot from eight feet. This made the score 49-36.

PEACOCK WAS ABLE to reduce the K-State lead to single digits twice after that, but Reed's pair of charity tosses with 12:19 to play, put the Jayhawks in double jeopardy for good.

Hartman credited Reed and company for a job well done.

"Randy was tough, wasn't he? He had a pretty good night's work," Hartman said. "I thought that everyone that played for us did a good job.

"Those Kansas kids played well, too. We had to earn every shot we got. I was very proud of my team. Any time you play a team three times — especially in this rivalry — it has a special meaning."

K-State sank 27 of 52 tries from the field for 51.9 percent. From the line, the 'Cats made 20 of 27 attempts for 74.1 percent. Randy Reed scored 10 points from the line in 11 attempts.

The Jayhawks were 26 of 54 from the field for 48.1 percent, and 10 of 15 from the line for 66.7 percent.

K-State travels to Kansas City for the second round of the Big Eight Tourney. The 'Cats take on the Oklahoma Sooners Friday at 9:10 p.m. at Kemper Arena.

Wildcat recruits

St. Louis, known as the gateway to the West, may well be the key to the basketball program next year. The Missouri city has four high school players who have made verbal commitments to attend K-State in 1982-83.

The most recent players announcing their intentions of coming to K-State are Alex Williams and Jonas Cody. They will accompany fellow St. Louis area players Tyrone Jackson, 6-6, and Ben Mitchell, 6-7. The latter two made verbal commitments a week ago.

Williams, a 6-8, 200-pounder from O'Fallen Tech, is averaging 19 points and 18 rebounds as a senior. He is leading the St. Louis metropolitan area in rebounding. His coach, Garland Goodwin, said Williams is the team's "air craft carrier."

"His attitude is his greatest asset. He is very coachable and a hard worker. The potential for development is definitely there," Goodwin said.

Other schools that attempted to acquire Williams services were Missouri, Texas A&M and Illinois State.

Cody, a 6-1, 180-pound guard, is averaging 24 points and 10 rebounds a game for Vashon, the same school that produced Forward Randy Reed. Cody's coach, Floyd Irons, speaks highly of the three-year starter.

"He has led the team in scoring for three years now. His strongest area is scoring, but he can also play aggressively on the other end," Irons said.

Cody was also recruited heavily by Nebraska, Iowa State and Southern Illinois.

Players may officially announce their decisions April 14, the national letter of intent day for basketball.

TO WHOM it may concern (T.F., L.N., R.V., K.W.): I'm not too sure how someone goes about apologizing for a totally unmeant but obviously painful stab in the back. I cannot apologize for what or who I am, only for the things I say and do sometimes. It has been said that one learns most of all from the mistakes he makes, which is no doubt true in this case. This is a mistake that I will make sure does not reoccur when I start over elsewhere. I guess the guy that said, "Friends are forever," never was acquainted with me. Lucky for him. You are the last people I would ever think of hurting. I know this doesn't sound appropriate after what has happened, but deep down this is truly what I feel. I will always remember you for the wonderful friends you were to me and the great times that we spent together. I will also dream about the many good times we could have experienced. Thank you for giving me my knife back. I love you all, Curt. (113) of the money went for reducing local property taxes. It failed, 50-74.

—Rep. Kenneth King (R-Leon), which would have added the 3× percent tax on the production of coal. It lost, 45-74.

THE BILL, which also would impose a 2½ percent tax on natural gas liquids, would funnel 20 percent of the new revenue raised by the severance tax into a state trust fund.

The purpose of that fund would be to keep a reserve so there would be money to fund education and other state needs in the future, when oil and gas production starts falling off as reserves dwindle.

The bill also designates that 5 percent of the revenue should be rebated to counties and school districts, to make up for the erosion of their property tax bases by imposition of the severance tax.

The 3½ percent tax on oil and gas and 2½ percent on natural gas liquids would generate an estimated $103.2 million new state revenue annually.

OF THAT amount, $78.2 million would go to the state general fund to be used mainly for funding school finance and helping rebuild state highways. Another $20.6 million would go into the trust fund and the remaining $4.4 million would be rebated to counties and school districts to offset reduced property tax valuations.

Carlin issued a statement, saying he was "very pleased with the cooperative effort that sends the bill to the Senate for the second straight year."

"The Senate is where the battle has been for two sessions, and we will soon join it there," Carlin said.

"I just hope the president of the Senate (Ross Doyen, an opponent) will allow a vote on it on the Senate floor.

"If he does, it will pass. He knows that, we know that, nd the people of Kansas deserve to know that."

LADY SAID he supports the severance tax, "because I think it's right for the people and for the future of Kansas. I think we need the revenue, and I'm willing to stand up and be counted."

The speaker, who is considering running for the GOP nomination for governor this year, rejected claims the oil and gas industry cannot afford the tax.

He said the company of the president of Kansas Independent Oil and Gas Association, Richard D. Smith of Wichita, stands to gain $3.2 million additional income annually when the federal windfall profits tax is rolled back next year.

"That's an $8,800-a-day tax break," Lady said. "In two days, they will get more than we pay most of our teachers in a year."

DEMOCRATIC MINORITY Leader Fred Weaver of Baxter Springs helped Lady argue for the bill in an infrequent display of bipartisan support.

Weaver chided some Republicans, who Weaver said had implied Lady supported the severance tax because he wants to run for governor on the issue.

"I take offense at that," said Weaver. "I know for all the time he's been up here he's tried to do what is best for the people of Kansas as he saw it."

Reagan

that is what it takes to buy peace for the rest of the century ... with every improvement in our military readiness that we make today, we are saving the life of some American boy who will be serving our country tomorrow."

At the Wallop rally, Reagan said that "Some of the same people who ran this country for the last 20 years — who pushed us to the brink of economic disaster — now want to steal your tax cut before you feel its relief."

Without mentioning that he once himself blamed the country's economic problems on deficit spending, Reagan repeatedly chastised his critics for complaining about the size of the deficit in his 1983 budget proposal.

Those who want to balance the budget by raising taxes haven't "gotten the message yet," the president said. "Listening to the born-again budget balancers moan about deficits is kind of like hearing a mugger in Central Park complain about crime in the streets."

House narrowly passes severance tax

TOPEKA (AP) — The Kansas House Wednesday gave final passage, with seven votes to spare, to a bill imposing a severance tax on oil and gas, but its chief sponsor, Speaker Wendell Lady, said he wasn't overjoyed.

The measure, which would tax oil and gas production at the rate of 3½ percent and also would tax manufactured natural gas liquids at a rate of 2½ percent, faced an uncertain future in the Senate — where the leadership remains adamantly opposed to it.

Senate President Ross Doyen said he probably would double refer it to the Assessment and Taxation and Ways and Means Committees of the upper legislative chamber, a tact he adopted last year and has used for other measures as well, including school finance.

THE SENATE president scotched a rumor he was considering assigning it to a third committee, education, because it is designed to raise additional revenue for school finance.

Sending the bill to two committees makes it twice as hard to get it to the Senate floor in the usual manner for debate and a vote.

A bill which would have imposed a 5 percent severance tax on oil and gas passed the House, 64-61, last year only to die in the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee on a 6-5 vote. If it had passed that panel, it still would have had to win endorsement of the Ways and Means Committee, on which Doyen sits.

"I'm pleased, of course, because it's something we worked hard for," Lady said of the expected House passage of the severance tax bill, 70-54.

"I can't say I'm elated, because no one likes to pass a tax. But I am satisfied that the oil and gas producers are in a position to pay, and it's either going to be them or the property taxpayers of this state. And I prefer that the former do the paying."

LADY SAID the $78 million new revenue the compromise severance tax plan would pump into the general fund is vitally needed for education and highways, and without it neither of those items can be adequately funded through available state resources.

Doyen has taken the position the state doesn't need any additional revenue, except for highways. He wants a gasoline and diesel tax increase to provide that money.

Lady challenged Doyen's double assignment of the severance tax and school finance bills to Senate committees, saying there is no justification for it.

"Neither of those bills is an appropriations measure by any stretch of the imagination," Lady said. "They don't spend a dime."

DOYEN HAS claimed that since the severance tax raises money which will be appropriated by the Legislature, it should be reviewed by the Ways and Means Committee.

Others see assignment of the severance tax bill to the appropriations committee as Doyen's trump card to kill it, if it should gain endorsement of the Assessment and Taxation Committee, which will consider it first.

Of the 11 members of the Senate Ways and Means Committee, six are regarded as solid opponents of the severance tax — Doyen, Bob Talkington, Paul Hess, Ron Hein, Frank Gaines and Joe Warren.

House votes to halt Fort Riley annexation

TOPEKA, Kan. (AP) — The House gave preliminary voice approval today to a bill which would prohibit Junction City from annexing any of the 110,000-acre Fort Riley Military Reservation.

An attempt by Rep. Ed Rolfs (R-Junction City) to amend the bill, which will be up for a final House vote Thursday, and let Junction City annex that portion of the army post which is in Geary County also failed.

It was among 19 bills given tentative approval by the House as it stepped up the debate pace ahead of next Wednesday's deadline for consideration of bills in the house of origin.

Speaker Wendell Lady warned the House that if it doesn't make satisfactory progress in his judgment in clearing its debate calendar of bills Thursday and Friday morning, he will keep the House in session late Friday debating.

Usually the House recesses for the weekend by noon on Fridays.

AMONG OTHER BILLS given tentative approval Wednesday and advanced to final votes were ones which would:

— Ban the manufacture and sale of plastic-coated bullets in Kansas.

— Prohibit nonprofit organizations which are licensed to conduct bingo games from operating them outside their home counties.

— Allow members of the Kansas National Guard to have as many specialized license plates as they have private motor vehicles.

— Require drivers of motorcycles and motorized bicycles to drive with their lights on at all times.

— Define salt water and authorize the spreading of it to build or maintain county roadbeds.

— Restrict the issuance of free state park privileges to Kansas senior citizens and handicapped residents, and require the elderly and handicapped from other states to buy

Eye, facial injuries rise with raquetball's popularity

By LAUREEN MOORE
Collegian Reporter

Slam. Bam. Racquets, balls, arms, legs and bodies fly around the small, four-walled court. In the midst of all this activity the most-vulnerable and least-protected part of the body — the eye — is left open to whatever may come its way.

"There has been a definite increase in eye and facial injuries due to racquetball since the Rec Complex opened," Dr. Robert Ecklund, associate professor of student health, said.

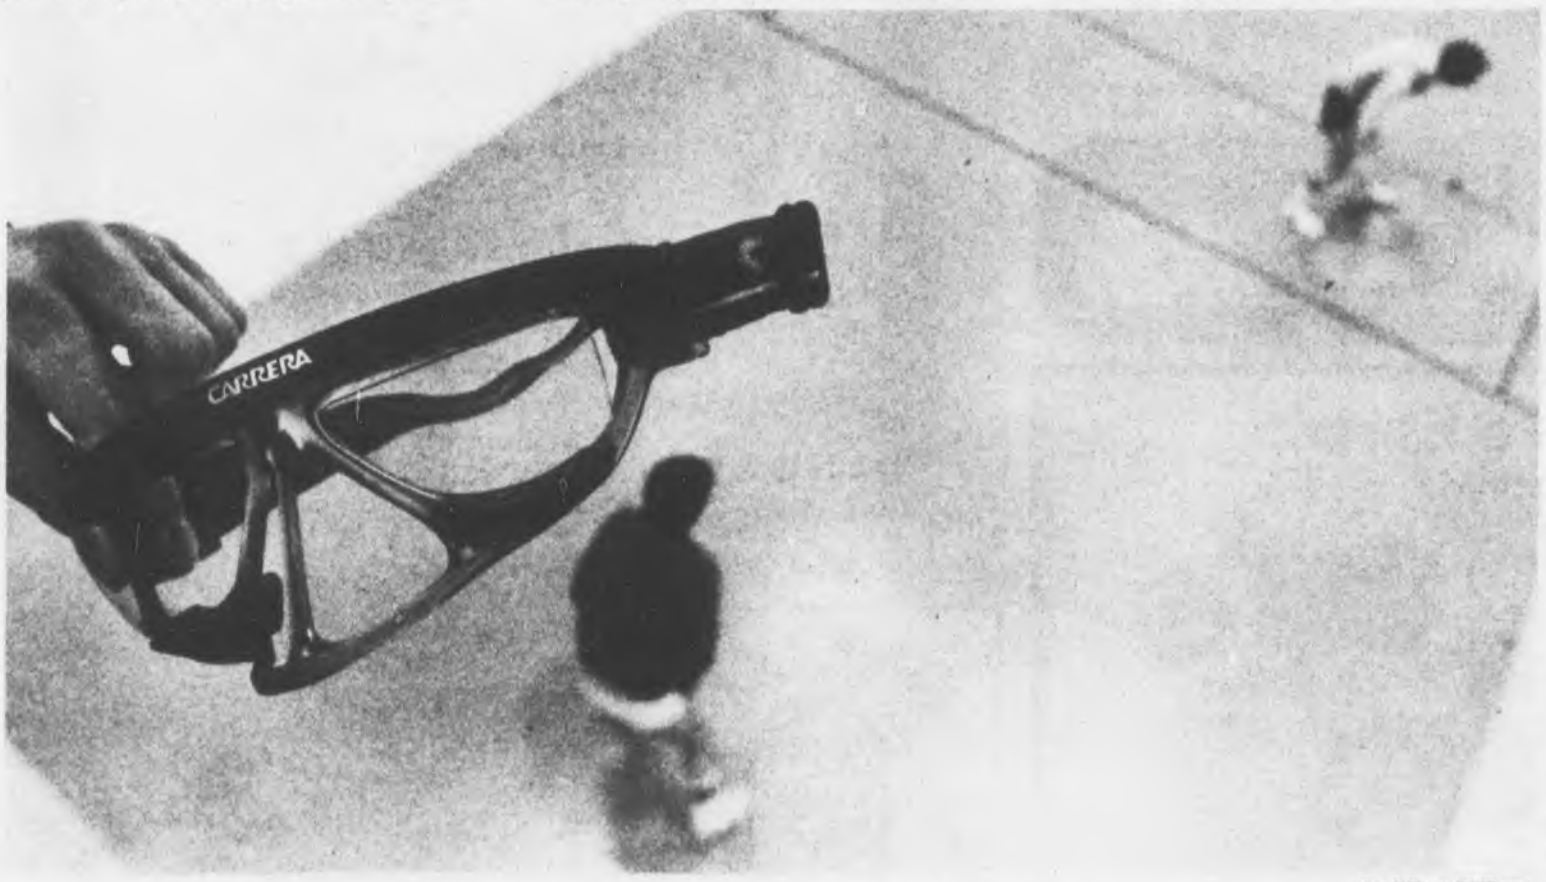
Although signs which stress the importance of wearing eye protection are posted on each racquetball court at the Recreation Complex, many players don't heed the precautions.

"I could compare urging players to wear safety glasses to protect their eyes with urging people to wear seat belts to save their lives," Ecklund said. "Even though it may be in their own best interests, you can't force them to do it."

As the popularity of racquetball increases, so does the number of eye injuries. Most injuries are caused by the moving ball, but some are the result of being hit with the opponent's racquet.

BALL SPEEDS in racquetball have been measured, using high speed photography, at 78 mph for a novice player and 127 mph for an expert player. The speed the racquet moves is close to the speed of the ball.

"The better a player is, the more aggressive he is on the court and the higher the risk of injury," Ecklund said. "The more experience he has does not decrease the risk of injury.



"Any eye protection is better than no protection at all, but closed eye guards provide the best protection for the eyes," he added.

Prescription eyeglasses do provide some protection, but if they are hit with adequate impact they will shatter and cause lacerations to the eye.

"Many players think that so-called shatter-resistant glasses are shatter-proof. This isn't true. They can, and sometimes do, break," Ecklund said.

THE OPEN EYE guards worn by many players prevent more injuries from racquets than from balls. A racquetball can be compressed within the upper and lower rim of the open eye guard with eye contact occuring at 50

Suitcase bomb clears two airports; enlisted man faces federal charges

BALTIMORE (AP) — An Air Force enlisted man allegedly planted a bomb in his wife's suitcase, and the device passed undetected through security at two airports as she flew from Washington to a Texas air base, the FBI said Wednesday.

"There's a lot of lucky people out there, that's all I can say," said FBI spokesman John Kuntz. "The Lord must have been looking out for us, I guess ... It was a real bomb, no doubt about it."

Edward D. Hegarty, agent in charge of the Baltimore FBI bureau, said Airman 1st Class Martin Thomas Bradley, 27, of Morningside, assigned to an organizational maintenance squadron at Andrews Air Force Base, was arrested Wednesday on two federal charges.

The FBI and Air Force Office of Special Investigations were called in on the case after Bradley's wife, Staff Sgt. Mary Jo Bradley, flew to Sheppard Air Force Base in Wichita Falls, Texas, on Tuesday and found a bomb in her suitcase when she arrived, Hegarty said.

MRS. BRADLEY was also stationed at Andrews Air Force Base but had been temporarily assigned to the Texas base, the FBI said.

Hegarty and other agents said Mrs. Bradley flew out of Washington National Airport and changed planes at Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport for a flight to Wichita Falls. The bomb escaped detection at both airports.

"There could have been some breakdown," said Fred Ferrar, an Federal Aviation Administration security official in Washington. "The system's not perfect but it does work pretty well."

OFFICIALS REFUSED to discuss a motive for the bomb planting or to say on which airline Mrs. Bradley flew.

"We're not making any comments on the flight, how it (the bomb) got through National Airport or anything," Kuntz said.

He declined to describe the bomb or say whether it was designed to be detonated at a specific altitude, by a sharp jolt or a timer.

"Until the bomb is analyzed, they (investigators) won't be able to make any determination about it and why it didn't go off," he said.

Ferrar said checks were being made into security procedures at National Airport.

The FBI and security officials also were trying to determine whether Mrs. Bradley carried the suitcase onto the plane or whether it had been checked into the luggage compartment.

DAVID HESS, an airport spokesman, explained that passengers entering flight terminals must pass through metal detectors at the airport and the luggage and handbags they carry passes through X-ray machines.

"We have means other than X-rays for (inspecting) checked-on luggage," Ferrar said, but he declined to elaborate.

Bradley was charged with attempted destruction of an aircraft and transportation of explosives in interstate commerce, the FBI said.

Federal agents said Bradley was held in the Prince George's County Detention Center pending a bail hearing at Andrews Air Force Base.

If convicted of both charges, he could face up to 30 years imprisonment and a fine of $20,000, Hegarty said.

Correction

It was incorrectly reported in Wednesday's Collegian that Dr. William Moore, professor of clinical pathology, will head the College of Veterinary Medicine, effective July 1. Moore is to head the Department of Laboratory Medicine within the college.

Moore joined the faculty in 1969 after serving as director of the clinical pathology service of the Animal Medical Center in New York, not the Animal Health Center as was reported.

Moore holds his bachelor's of science and DVM degrees from Cornell University, not the University of Minnesota. He received his Ph.d at Minnesota.

Judge refuses to rule in Hyatt class-action suit

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A U.S. District Court judge has declined to rule on legal questions raised in a class action suit on behalf of victims of last summer's collapse of two skywalks at the Hyatt Regency Hotel.

Attorneys said Tuesday's decision by Judge Scott O. Wright probably would leave out-of-court settlements in limbo.

Several attorneys said they believed the ruling may assist an appeal of Wright's order of Jan. 25, which established the class action suit.

Wright had been asked to decide if defendants in the class action suit could present evidence on any out-of-court settlements already reached. He also was requested to rule whether the defendants could have Hyatt victims or their survivors sign full releases for any damages when they agree to an out-of-court settlement. The releases would cover both compensatory and punitive damages.

Attorneys for several defendants have told Wright they would not continue negotiations for additional settlements unless they could use those settlements as evidence in the class action trial or obtain the full releases.

Alda says ERA will not bring on 'dire events'

MIDDLETOWN, Conn. — Actor Alan Alda said none of the "dire events" predicted by opponents of the Equal Rights Amendment will come to pass if the proposed constitutional amendment is ratified.

"You will not find a woman in the men's room unless she is fixing the plumbing," Alda told an audience of about 1,200 people at Wesleyan University on Tuesday night.

ERA would ensure that courts not rule against women in divorce settlements and the job market, Alda said.

Alda, who has three daughters, admitted that the amendment may not be approved by the required 38 states by the June 30 deadline. Connecticut is one of the 35 states that have approved the ERA.

Carson airs views, tells story of recent arrest

BURBANK, Calif. — Johnny Carson was brought on and off the stage by an actor in a police uniform, but the host of NBC's "Tonight" show was only half joking.

Carson had an encounter with men in blue Saturday when he was arrested for drunken driving, and he joked and talked seriously about the incident on his show Tuesday night.

"You don't know how nice that sounds," he said about the opening applause. "Would you like to be my character witnesses?"

Carson, 58, said he was stopped, for not having a current license plate sticker, about two blocks from the restaurant he and his wife, Joanna, had just left. He said he complied with "every request made by police, which included a test to determine whether too much wine may have been consumed with our dinner."

"I regret the incident," he added later, "and I'll tell you one thing — you will never see me do that again."

For the misdemeanor drunken driving charge, he faces a maximum first-time-offender penalty of at least two days in jail or a 90-day restriction allowing him only to drive to and from work. There also are fines ranging from $375 to $500 and mandatory attendance in an alcohol-education class.

Officials ignore pleas for help; dancer dies

SAN DIEGO — A terrified belly dancer, convinced that her former Turkish lover was out to kill her, sought help in vain from the police, immigration officials, a congressman and a newspaper.

Lisa Miller, 32, bought two watchdogs and even had burglar bars installed at her home in suburban Poway.

A week ago, a Greek restaurant where she danced was destroyed in a fire set by an arsonist, police said. In September, the camera shop she managed had been torched.

On Tuesday, Miller was fatally shot in the head. Her ex-boyfriend, a former member of the Turkish merchant marine, then turned the gun on himself, police say. Hasan "Michael" Ogen, 34, was in fair condition after being booked for investigation of murder.

Miller had driven into the parking lot at a Mira Mesa shopping center, apparently followed by her attacker, who pulled up behind and blocked her car. Her body was found in the car's front seat.

"This is a tragedy of the system," said Steve Casey of the district attorney's office. "The system failed Lisa Miller."

Miller danced her last dance Friday at the Al Salaam, a Turkish restaurant where she had performed "off and on," according to Linda Hreish, sister of the owner.

"Every day she came in, she was shaking," she said.

War memorial has dual purpose

The government has finally deemed it appropriate to build a monument in remembrance of the men who gave their lives in Vietnam. In a nationwide design compeition for the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, to be built on the Mall near the Lincoln Memorial in Washington D.C., a surprising entry by a Yale University undergraduate, Maya Ying Lin, was chosen.

The design has been both praised and condemned by many. The monument's design calls for two long, low, black granite walls to be buried in the earth into a sloping hill and be visible from one angle. The names of the soldiers who died in the war will be inscribed in the granite.

The critics of the design feel that the memorial is unheroic, somehow unbefitting of the purpose. The real debatable question concerns the purposes of building memorials of past battles.

Over the years, war and its purpose and image have been greatly altered, as well as its results. The Vietnam battlefields did not recieve the glorified form of patroitism that past wars soaked and basked in. The political and business purposes and designs behind the war, which resulted in the loss of approximately 57,692 American soldiers, are varied and equally debatable.

War memorials should stand to honor those who gave their lives and as a reminder to future generations of the horrors and sorrows which result from military politics. The Vietnam Veterans faced entry into a war which many of his fellow countymen grew to disapprove of. Hence, few were given the glorious honors formerly bestowed upon a man in uniform.

Praisers of the memorial design cite its understated affect and its compatibility with the landscape as points of approval. Yet, only after it is built will its approval be known. Will those that walk by it stop and pray that such future loss of life be prevented? Will it have the chilling effect of the best war memorial ever built, the remains of the Auschwitz Nazi concentration camp? The future will see and, perhaps, learn.

Disaster reporting in its worst form

The newspapers, television broadcasts and newsmagazines always seem to be full of bad news.

Almost every item is about people cutting other people and their ideas down, often without offering constructive comments of their own. And it often seems that there is a daily disaster. It has gotten so bad, and the disasters have gotten so bizarre, that any day I expect to see an article like this in the newspaper.

HOLLYWOOD (API) — More than 250 people have died in the past nine months during filming of "The Ultimate Disaster Movie," according to Hollywood sources.

Irwin Allen, producer and director of disaster movies like "The Towering Inferno," "Airport" and "Airport '79," "The Poseidon Adventure" and "Earthquake," staged and filmed disasters at Kansas City, Mo. and Washington D.C., as well as in other places, for the purpose of making the ultimate disaster picture.

"Sure, I caused the skywalks at the Hyatt Regency in Kansas City to fall. It was an ingenious idea, who else would have thought of it?" Allen told the Associated Press International.

"And who else would have thought about an airplane hitting a bridge during rush hour in Washington D.C.? I tried to get it to hit the Jefferson Memorial, but the government wouldn't let me. The White House would have been better, especially on Inauguration Day," Allen said.

"I've always been good with airplanes. How about that plane in Boston that slid off the runway. Who else could have thought of that? And how about those Thunderbirds? I was the one that suggested that great, slam-bang ending to their show. Oh, I love it!" he said.

"Unfortunately, I didn't have anything to do with the oil rig falling into the ocean, but I wish I would have. What a great disaster. I also didn't have anything to do with the winter of '82, the 1981 baseball season, the Royals, the Kings, the University of Kansas Jayhawks or the Reagan budget. I can't do everything, I'm only one man," Allen said.

THE FILM, to be called "The Ultimate Disaster Movie," is to be released early this summer.

Allen said the picture would star Art Carney, George Burns, Gary Coleman, Elizabeth Taylor and Brooke Shields. "I'm looking forward to seeing both of those stuck-up broads die," he said. "I had planned to have Jack Albertson in the picture, but he died. He'll still have a guest shot in the Hyatt and the Washington D.C. scenes, but no speaking parts."

Allen said he was sorry that innocent people had to die, but he said the next of kin would get a share of profits from the film. "We all have to go sometime, why not be immortalized as you die," Allen said.

The report was issued at noon Wednesday. By 1:30, central daylight time, lawyers had filed more than $2 billion worth of lawsuits against the Hollywood producer.

An article similar to this probably will not appear in the near future, but at times it seems like it could. All this bad news couldn't be happening by chance, could it?

Policy change needed

Editor,

I am writing this in regard to the article "Committee hears student dispute; policy decision may set precedent," in the Feb. 26 edition of the Collegian. I would first like to give Robert Lytle a hand for being one of "those who scream loudest." All policies are not perfect and if a change in policy is needed — so be it.

With an increase in the number of foreign teachers hired at K-State, I feel the language barrier between students and teachers is becoming a problem, especially in the math department. A teacher, no matter what his qualifications, is of little value to a university if students are unable to understand him due to a heavy accent.

At the University of Kansas incoming foreign students are tested for their ability to understand and speak English. Crash courses are given to those who fail the test. Why does K-State not test teachers for their ability to be understood? Is K-State a "backward" university? Isn't English the official language here? Teachers should be qualified to speak English in a manner which can be understood by a majority of students plus have a broad enough vocabulary to answer any questions. Maybe crash courses in English pronunciation need to be set up. Isn't it time to start looking at not only the teacher's qualifications but the teacher's ability to communicate as well?

One last song for the road

"This song is for a friend of mine. I just want him to know what he means to me."

As Don stopped speaking the song came over the airwaves. The Kenny Roger's tune, "Love Lifted Me," brought tears of joy to my eyes. Tears continued and soon streamed down my face. It was then that I realized how much Don had meant to me.

As host of the KSDB country show last semester, Don Martin would often dedicate a song to a friend who was feeling down. The song served as a reminder, letting them know that someone still cared for them.

Don's love for his friends was apparent in his dedication to them. Many were the times we talked, for he always made time to listen to my problems. He shared joys, tears, laughter and fears. He took interest in the hopes and dreams of the people around him. All too often his efforts went unrewarded, but he continued where others might have ceased.

DON CARED ABOUT OTHERS. Caring too much was the only real problem he had. Numerous times he would back down rather than be at odds with a roommate or friend. He became involved in helping shoulder someone's burden, while his own load would drag and become heavier.

Don had his problems. We all do, but few of us look to see the sunshine waiting at the edge of the storm as Don did. I will always remember him with a smile on his face and a kind word on his lips.

Maybe my description of Don sounds to good to be true. For like the rest of us, he was human. He had his faults. To me Don was kind and compassionate. He was loyal and honest, happy with the cards that life had dealt him. Most important to me, Don called me "friend."

Don Martin died Monday, February 22, 1982. Don's new home is Paradise, as he was a Christian. His many friends can take comfort in the fact that he is now in a far better place.

Don's body has lost that gift which we call life. Don is still alive, he lives eternally. He shall also live on in those people who were lucky enough to know him. My memories of Don are among the most precious I shall ever know.

Remember Don, but mourn no more. Concern yourselves with life. Live it to the fullest extent. Have compassion for those still in sorrow, help them, lend a shoulder upon which to cry.

Don, your love lifted me when I was down and out. I hope that I can follow your example. Thank you and farewell.

Defending the right of dissension

Editor,

In response to the letter from Mr. Holden (March 2, 1982), I would like to say that, after studying Article III of my nation's constitution, I found nothing which prohibited the distribution of materials or expression of ideas contrary to U.S. policy. Indeed such an entry to our Constitution would violate one of the basic tenets of this nation: the right to present a dissenting point of view.

Our history books are filled with people who investigated America's blemishes and fought to clear them up. Not all of them were citizens. Some were foreigners who were suspected of questionable politics. Some were black slaves who were not even called people. Then there was Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry, Susan B. Anthony and Martin Luther King. Would any of these be called dangerous to America today?

Unless we are to regress back to the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798, the most repressive measures ever directed against U.S. political activity in which aliens were involved, we must not deny any person within our borders the right to free expression, even if it is considered anti-U.S. Article III was written to make it almost impossible to convict someone of treason because its writers knew what a terrible thing repression was.

I don't like what the Iranians are saying anymore than Mr. Holden. But I will, in the words of Voltaire, "defend to the death their right to say it." The solution to this problem is not to silence the critics, but rather to be able to refute their claims intelligently and with the support of the Constitution. Silence in a democracy is frightening.

Cyclist's stereotype is undeserved

Editor,

The editorial about the government aiding the clothespin industry was interesting in an odd way. Our elected leaders have seen fit to help out Chrysler with great amounts of loaned money (which will most likely never be paid back) and now the clothespin industry?

While all this was going on they have been steadily trying to eliminate a lifestyle and industry that could help solve a lot of the current environmental problems: bikers and the motorcycle industry.

In spite of all the discrimination we have had heaped on us, including some men having been murdered because they were bikers, the world of motorcycles is better off now than it ever was.

The only American motorcycle company left, Harley-Davidson, has rebounded from the brink of failure in 1969 to become one of the top sales divisions of AMF in 1981, when it was sold back to the Davidson family and others.

Also, if motorcycles were more popular, there would be less air pollution, less traffic congestion, parking problems would almost disappear and the people new to riding would discover how much fun it is to travel by motorcycle.

But, unfortunately, all that most people know about motorcycling is what the news media tells them and it is never good. It is often made up by some sensation-seeking newswriter.

The present plethora of motorcycle "gangs" was created in this way and it's really a bum rap. Most riders don't fit that stereotype and a lot of people who might be motorcyclists are not because of "what will people think." They miss out on all the good there is to it.

Dissecting a carburetor... Dean Roach, freshman in general engineering, works on a "dissective engineering" project for his Concepts of Engineering class taught by Dwight Nesmith, associate professor of engineering. Members of the class take apart items to learn more about design and function.

Students dissect equipment

By KAREN CUNNINGHAM
Collegian Reporter

To the untrained observer, it might appear that engineering students are vandalizing everything from thermostats to valves, pumps and carburetors. Actually, they are learning dissective engineering.

The Concepts of Engineering course taught by Dwight Nesmith, associate professor of engineering, uses dissective engineering as a learning experience. This is the method of tearing things apart to learn more about design and function.

"Materials for the students' projects come from various shops in the engineering departments and have been taken out of old part boxes," Nesmith said.

Students are given tools in order to disassemble the equipment.

"In the past, students have dissected pressure gauges, timers, valves and switches," he said.

According to Nesmith, Philip Kirmser, professor of electrical engineering, came up with the dissective engineering method about six years ago.

By including a course in dissective engineering in its curriculum, the department plans to help students learn how things are made and improve both graphic and English communication methods, Nesmith said.
